SEC. —. That any testimony, affidavits, reports of officers, and other papers on file in the Departments or in the courts, relating to such claims, shall be considered by the court as competent evidence: Provided, That such testimony, affidavits, reports of officers, and other papers were competent evidence at the time they were so filed.

SEC. —. That no judgment shall be rendered in favor of any claimant under the provisions of this act, unless said claimant shall establish the fact that the proceeds of the property sued for were covered into the Treasury of the United States and became a part of the fund known as the captured and abandoned property fund, under the provisions of the act of March 12, 1863, and the acts amendatory thereof, and is now a part of the general fund of the United States Treasury, and all such judgments rendered under this act shall be paid to the original owner, his heirs, or legal representatives, by the Secretary of the Treasury, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

SEC. —. That all sales, transfers, or assignments of any claims against said fund heretofore or hereafter made, and all contracts heretofore made for fees and allowances to claimants' attorneys are hereby declared null and void, and all warrants issued by the Secretary of the Treasury in payment of such judgments shall be made payable and delivered only to the claimant or his lawful heirs, executors, or administrators, except so much thereof as shall be allowed claimants' attorneys by the court for prosecuting said claims; and the Court of Claims in rendering judgment under this act shall, in each case, fix the amount of compensation to the attorney or attorneys prosecuting the claim in said court.

Mr. BACON. I simply desire to say, in order that the character of the amendment may be understood by the Senate, that the particular purpose of the amendment is to authorize the Court of Claims to adjudicate, and, in accordance with such adjudication, that there may be paid out a fund which is in the Treasury of the United States, ascertained, audited, and definitely settled, amounting to $10,943,439.08, which is the proceeds of the cotton seized and sold by the Government of the United States and held as a trust for the original owners of the cotton—a fund which the Supreme Court of the United States has solemnly adjudicated does not belong to the Government of the United States, but does belong to the original owners of this property, and that the Government of the United States holds it as a trustee for such original owners. That is the scope of the amendment offered by me, and its purpose is to give the Court of Claims jurisdiction to determine the several parties to whom this fund of over $10,000,000 belongs, in order that it may be returned to them.

Mr. GAMBLE. I suggest that the amendment proposed by the Senator from Georgia be printed and lie upon the table.

Mr. BACON. It will be printed in the RECORD, and I should also like to have it printed as suggested by the Senator from South Dakota.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. OVERMAN. I offer an amendment and ask that it be printed in the RECORD without reading.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment referred to is to insert as additional sections the following:

SEC. —. That the proceeds of the tax on cotton illegally collected from the people of the several States of the Union by the Government of the United States during the years 1863, 1864, 1865, 1866, 1867, and 1868, under and by virtue of the acts of Congress which provided for the levy and collection of such tax, and which said tax acts were passed July 1, 1862; March 7, 1864; July 13, 1866; and March 2, 1867, respectively, shall be refunded to the rightful owners, their heirs, or legal representatives; and to this end the Court of Claims is hereby clothed with full and complete jurisdiction to hear, to try, and determine all claims that may be filed in this behalf, said court to prescribe the rules for some simple and expeditious procedure, that persons claiming as original owners, heirs, or legal representatives may have the matter of their claims speedily heard and adjudicated.

SEC. —. That immediately upon this act becoming a law, the Commissioner of Internal Revenue shall compile a statement from the records of his office showing the amount of money collected from the people of each State on account of the tax on cotton for each of the years 1863, 1864, 1865, 1866, 1867, and 1868, respectively, and showing, where the same is possible, the names of the persons, firms, or corporations from whom collected, and the respective amounts, and shall certify, under the seal of his office, that the same is full, complete, and correct, and then file it with the clerk of the Court of Claims. This statement shall be accessible to all persons, and shall be accepted as an accurate statement of the amount due the people of each of the States by the United States on account of the illegal taxes so collected.

SEC. —. That the Commissioner of Internal Revenue shall, at the same time he files with the clerk of the Court of Claims a certified statement as required in section 2 of this act, file a duplicate of such statement with the Treasurer of the United States, and there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, a sum equal to the total amount shown by said statement for the purpose of paying the same in full. Each judgment rendered by the Court of Claims shall be promptly paid the claimant by the Treasurer of the United States, on a warrant drawn on the Treasurer in favor of such claimant by the clerk of the Court of Claims.

SEC. —. That claimants shall be allowed the period of five years from the time when this act becomes a law within which to file their claims, and all money remaining in the Treasury to the credit of the different States unclaimed, as shown by the certified statement of the internal-revenue collector, the judgments and pending claims deducted, shall, on the warrants of the respective governors of the different States, be paid by the Treasurer of the United States to said States, and become a part of the rural school fund of the respective States.

SEC. —. That this act shall take effect immediately upon its passage and approval of the President or upon its becoming a law without such approval.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, the purpose of that amendment is to pay back to the rightful owners in the Southern States the amount collected, as I claim, unjustly and unconstitutionally as a tax levied on cotton in 1863, 1864, 1865, 1866, 1867, and 1868, which tax the Supreme Court has said was an unconstitutional tax. It amounts to about $15,000,000.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be printed and lie on the table.

ALLEGED PEONAGE IN STATE OF FLORIDA.

Mr. CAULFIELD. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on the Judiciary, I call up the following privileged resolution.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

Resolution 304.

Resolved, That the Attorney-General of the United States be, and he is hereby, directed to furnish to the House of Representatives, at the earliest practicable day, the following information, namely:

First. How much money has been expended during the present Administration by the Department of Justice in and about the ferreting out and prosecution of alleged peonage cases in the State of Florida?

Second. In what capacity is one Mrs. Mary Grace Quackenbos connected with the Department of Justice, and what compensation does she receive, both in the way of salary and expenses and as perquisites?

Third. How many detectives are employed by the Department of Justice to look up evidence in alleged peonage cases in the State of Florida, and what compensation do they receive?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri is recognized.

Mr. CAULFIELD. Mr. Speaker, some ten years ago when the news came to us from the island of Cuba that men, women, and children were being penned in so-called "concentration camps," there to be starved and mistreated, it was not long before tens of thousands of armed men were on their way, before hundreds of millions of dollars were being expended that they might be freed. And this, nothwithstanding those outrages occurred under an alien flag, on alien soil, and affected only aliens.

But now, when the news comes that a modified form of slavery has been revived in certain parts of this country, in isolated cases it is true, where, however, the mistreatment accorded to the poor victims is worse than ever occurred in slavery, and the Department of Justice sends a woman and a few detectives to investigate, we have this resolution presented asking how much it costs, and how many detectives were sent. Think of it, to even hint that human liberty can cost too much; that the Department of Justice can be too vigilant on behalf of human liberty!

Now, Mr. Speaker, I am not going to discuss the question of whether peonage exists in any part of the United States. There was a resolution introduced and adopted by this House on March 2 providing that the Committee on Immigration should make an investigation of that. But, sir, I deem it exceedingly unfortunate that this resolution should have been introduced sixteen days after we had adopted that other resolution of investigation. It seems to me that it contains or is intended as an unnecessary attack upon the Department of Justice for doing its duty.

And why is the Department of Justice attacked? I will answer, sir, in the words of the gentleman who introduced this resolution, a gentleman for whom I have the highest respect and regard, the gentleman from Florida [Mr. CLARK]. He said in his speech on March 2, discussing the resolution of investigation that was adopted:

It seems that when the present head of the Law Department of the Government, and which ought to be the very fountain head of justice, got well into the saddle, he, instead of looking after the law business of the Government of the United States, began a crusade in certain States to regulate sociological conditions.

That is it, Mr. Speaker. Instead of doing something else the Department of Justice was protecting human liberty. Instead of doing something else the Department of Justice was too active in protecting the laboring men in this country. He calls it "regulating sociological conditions." Mr. Speaker, the Department of Justice in regulating sociological conditions was enforcing the most precious laws upon our statute books, and I am proud to say they were laws put there by a Republican Congress. The thirteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States provides that neither slavery nor involuntary servitude, except as a punishment for crime whereof the party shall have been duly convicted, shall exist within the United States or any place subject to their jurisdiction; and Congress has enacted laws pursuant to that provision, and the Department of Justice was enforcing those laws. But, sir, from the speeches of the gentleman from Florida [Mr. CLARK] one would think that the Department of Justice was going around like a raging lion, seeking whom it might devour, seeking some innocent Florida citizen to clap into jail. But, sir, I affirm that the Department of Justice has been exceedingly conservative in its actions on this matter. It has not acted and did not act until countless complaints were made to it, and then only after being satisfied with the justice of them.

Mr. Speaker, at this point in my remarks I ask leave to insert a list of peonage complaints pending in the Department of Justice, which may be found appended to the report of the Attorney-General for 1907.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I shall ask the gentleman to read them.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CAULFIELD] yield?

Mr. CAULFIELD. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] objects.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I ask the gentleman to read them as a part of his remarks instead of asking unanimous consent to insert them.

Mr. CAULFIELD. Mr. Speaker, then I shall have to refrain from inserting this list of complaints in the RECORD, because I did not bring it with me. I did not wish to trouble the House to take up its time reading that long list of complaints. Suffice it to say, Mr. Speaker, that if the Department of Justice, reading those complaints, had refused to act, every liberty-loving citizen of this Republic would have cried "Shame!"

This is a long list, an awful list, and the Department of Justice did its duty, and it did a righteous act, when pursuant to these complaints it caused investigations to be made. But, sir, I wish to show that the Department of Justice did not enter even the State of Florida until called upon to do so by the action of a citizen of Florida—Hon. John M. Cheney, United States district attorney for the district which embraces Jacksonville.

Let me read this testimonial to his character, made by the gentleman from Florida in the speech that I have mentioned:

John M. Cheney is a lawyer of recognized ability in the State of Florida, a man of high character, in whom the people, without regard to party, have confidence.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. CAULFIELD. I do not.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. CAULFIELD. Now, sir, the gentleman from Florida mentions the O'Hara case. He painted O'Hara as a saint. Now, I do not wish to discuss the O'Hara case. The gentleman has been acquitted. I think he is very fortunate. I read the testimony. He has been acquitted, and I am one of those who do not question the verdict of a jury that acquits. But John M. Cheney, in his argument before that jury said (I read from the stenographic record in that case):

I want to disabuse your mind of another thing, that this case was begun in Washington—I want to tell you that I stand responsible for this O'Hara case. Mr. O'Hara was brought up and bound over before any civil-service man was ever brought here; it was his case being bound over that called the attention of the authorities to the fact that peonage was being committed in Florida, and the office in Florida is responsible, and is willing and proud to assume that responsibility.

There, Mr. Speaker, it is shown that the Department of Justice did not initiate from Washington any of these peonage investigations or prosecutions in Florida. But, sir, it has been suggested that the Department of Justice has not been justified. Hear what the gentleman from Florida said:

Suffice it to say that of all the ridiculous, farcical proceedings under the forms of law, the capers cut by these people in the Federal courts of Florida take the palm.

Sir, I have a further expression here from a Florida citizen, which shows that the Department was justified; but first let me prove his character by the eloquent words of the gentleman from Florida. In the speech that I have mentioned he says of Judge Locke:

Having had the pleasure to be closely associated with Judge Locke for some years, I can truthfully say that I know him well. I want to say in this presence and to all the world that there is no man from Maine to the Philippine Islands, wherever the Stars and Stripes float, who is more beloved, more respected, and more honored by the people among whom he lives and where his judicial labors are performed than is Judge James W. Locke. No man in all this Union wears the ermine with more of honor and of credit than does he. No man need fear injustice in his court.

In his charge to the jury in the O'Hara case, this Judge Locke said:

Now, gentleman, another point I am going to take this opportunity to express myself fully and freely upon. That is this: I consider this vicious practice of peonage that appears to be growing up around here—I will not say that it is, but there is a great deal of testimony tending to show it—that it is the direct result of the vicious law of this State, called the "laborers' lien law;" no, not the laborers' lien law, but the law providing that a party who does not work out a contract, once signed, when he has got a dollar's worth of flour, can be locked up in jail. I have no hesitation in saying I consider that law null and void.

Here is another voice from North Carolina:

Referring to the peonage case against Smith and Berry, in western North Carolina, Federal Judge Boyd said in an interview published in the Washington Post of June 18 last:

"The verdict is the business of the jury, but this thing of tying human beings behind buggies and driving them like cattle long distances and then whipping them has got to stop in my district.

"I don't say that the defendants here were guilty of the charges of cruelty, whipping men and women from time to time, but somebody was, and if these things do not cease in this district I will see if I have not got some power as a judge. There has been evidence here of cruelty so excessive as to put to shame the veriest barbarian that ever lived. This man Smith may not have been guilty, but his agents were, and, as I have said, the thing has got to stop in my district."

In a peonage case which was before the circuit court of appeals for the eighth circuit, Circuit Judge Adams, after epitomizing the evidence, said, in the opinion of the court:

That such flagrant violation of law, such shameless inhumanity and brutality, such base dishonor to American citizenship could be deliberately practiced in a civilized and Christian community by intelligent men is a reproach to our civilization and challenges instant and vigorous protest and action by all right-minded men.

Mr. Speaker, I do not read these statements for the purpose of proving that peonage exists to any great extent. I produce them to prove that the Department of Justice was justified and was right in investigating charges of peonage and prosecuting them where they thought proper. I wish, sir, before I cease, to read this statute of Alabama, which is as follows:

PEONAGE STATUTE.

Chapter 193, section 5510 (3762), (4331), (1473).—Immigrants leaving service without payment of advances: Any immigrant who abandons or leaves the service of an employer without repaying all passage money and all other advances must, on conviction, be fined in a sum not more than double the amount of wages for the unexpired term of service, and imprisoned not longer than three months, or sentenced to hard labor for the county for not more than three months, at the discretion of the jury.

I do not offer that as a reflection on the State of Alabama, but I affirm, sirs, that for whatever purpose it was enacted, that is a peonage statute pure and simple, and as long as such a statute is on the statute book of any State the Department of Justice would be derelict in its duty if it did not keep up a constant investigation to ascertain whether its provisions were being enforced. I have here an affidavit, by way of information, which was made under that statute, charging a poor devil with a crime in having left his employer. I will not read it, and I can not insert it in my remarks because of the objection of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS], but I am glad to say that the man who made this affidavit under that statute is now under sentence to the penitentiary, because of a prosecution by the Department of Justice.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Speaker, what is the name of the man?

Mr. CAULFIELD. W. S. Harlan. Mr. Speaker, I have here a list of peonage convictions, and I ask unanimous consent that I may insert that in my remarks, merely for the purpose of showing that the Department of Justice was justified.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, of course the gentleman understands that I am objecting to all unanimous consent. He has unlimited time——

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, there is no chance for debate on that proposition under the rules.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi objects.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Read it; you have plenty of time to read it.

Mr. CAULFIELD. I will read it, Mr. Speaker:

RECENT PEONAGE CONVICTIONS.

Florida-Pensacola district, November, 1906.—W. S. Harlan, S. E. Huggins, and C. C. Hilton, convicted of conspiracy to arrest one Rudolph Lanninger to be returned to peonage. Harlan sentenced to eighteen months, one of the others to fifteen, and one to thirteen months' imprisonment.

Robert Gallagher, Oscar Sandor, and Walter E. Grace, convicted of conspiracy to commit peonage by arresting and returning one Trudick Mahaley. Gallagher sentenced to fifteen months' imprisonment, Grace to thirteen months, Sandor to thirteen months besides fines.

John B. Graham convicted of peonage at Pensacola about October, 1907, sentenced to six months in county jail and to pay a fine of $500.

Thomas A. Graham, thirteen months in penitentiary and to pay a fine of $500.

Florida, Jacksonville, and Tampa district, December, 1906—Jacksonville.—F. I. Howden and E. H. Benson. Howden and Benson were tried at Tampa and convicted.

North Carolina-Western district.—At Charlotte, December, 1906, the Carolina Company, W. W. McElroy, and Mark Baxter pleaded guilty. The company was fined $1,250, the other two $1,000 each.

South Carolina.—Habeas corpus on behalf of Elijah and Enoch Drayton, held under State labor-contract law. Department of Justice directed district attorney to argue the case, which he did. Judge Brawley released prisoners and held State law unconstitutional.

In habeas corpus case of Jack Holman later, January, 1908, the supreme court of the State released for same reason—that State law unconstitutional.

West Virginia.—There have been three separate prosecutions for peonage at Charleston, W. Va., against coal and lumber companies or persons connected with them. Pleas of guilty were entered on the condition that the courts should inquire into the facts with a view to fixing fines. In the Thatcher Coal and Coke Company case the court fixed the fine at $1,000, with all costs and the expenses of the inquiry; in the Raleigh Lumber Company case, the same; in the Rittner Lumber Company case a fine of $10,000 and all costs and expenses were fixed.

Missouri.—A case, brought under Revised Statutes 5508, resulted in conviction and sentences below stated. The sentences were: Charles M. Smith, sr., fine of $5,000 and costs and imprisonment at Leavenworth for three years and six months; C. M. Smith, jr., same fine and two years and six months' imprisonment; William Woods and Rogers, $100 and costs fine and two years' imprisonment; Floyd Woods, same fine, and two years and six months' imprisonment; Stone and Field, same fine, one year and six months' imprisonment.

Mr. HUGHES of West Virginia. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. CAULFIELD. Yes.

Mr. HUGHES of West Virginia. I want to ask him if he does not think that there should be some statute whereby these lumber companies and other people who take men down there to their place to work and employ them——

Mr. CAULFIELD. What is the question?

Mr. HUGHES of West Virginia. They take these fellows to their works and take care of them and feed them for a day or two, and then these men who have been brought down there refuse to pay for their transportation from New York to the place where they have been taken. Do not you think the State ought to adopt some law to compel these men who are brought there to pay back to the companies the expense of the transportation in getting them there?

Mr. CAULFIELD. There is an action for debt. It is not fair to make a man a slave until he pays back a debt. I certainly do not think there ought to be a law which would permit that.

Mr. HUGHES of West Virginia. In some of these cases you have read there the lumber companies, for instance, the Ritt-ner Lumber Company, engaged these men in New York and paid their transportation to West Virginia, and kept the men there for four or five days, took care of them, and fed them; but as soon as the men got in condition to work, they moved down to the next lumber operation below and went to work there, in order to avoid paying the amount that had been advanced for their transportation from New York to West Virginia.

Mr. CAULFIELD. I am not in favor of going back to the old system of imprisonment for debt. [Applause.]

Mr. FINLEY rose.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Missouri yield to the gentleman from South Carolina?

Mr. CAULFIELD. No; I do not yield now. I do not mean to cast any slur upon any State in this Union. I love one of the stars of the flag about as well as I love any other star, and I love them all. I believe that the people of every State in this Union love liberty alike, but I believe, sir, that it is a mistake to assume that these prosecutions hurt the credit of a State, hurt its prosperity, hurt its name; it is not the prosecution itself, but the men that make the prosecution necessary that hurts. [Applause.] And even if these prosecutions hurt the prosperity of a State, I say then let us hurt it, for liberty is higher and better than prosperity. [Applause.]

But I deny that prosecutions hurt a State. I am from the great State of Missouri. I love Missouri, but the Department of Justice found indictments against and convicted seven men in my State of the crime of peonage, and they were sentenced to the penitentiary. I am not ashamed of that. I am proud that the men who sat on that jury and rendered that verdict for liberty were twelve liberty-loving Missourians. [Applause.] I would that that verdict could be blazoned across the western skies telling the poor immigrant who lands on the Atlantic coast that in my great State dwell the twelve men who rendered that verdict.

We love liberty in Missouri, and that conviction shows that we love liberty. The convictions in Florida do not show that the people of Florida do not love liberty. And, sir, there is another reason why the Department of Justice should not be criticised by this Congress. This is a Republican Congress, and the Department of Justice is carrying out a Republican policy when it emancipates and dignifies labor. [Applause on the Republican side.] I wish to say that that is one of the policies that we did not steal from any Democratic platform. [Applause and laughter on the Republican side.]

From the time that Lincoln emancipated the slaves until the present day the policy of the Republican party has been to uplift labor on American soil, and I believe that as long as there is a Republican party it will continue to do so. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Now, reserving the balance of my time, Mr. Speaker, I yield twenty minutes to the gentleman from Florida.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Speaker, I was content when this House of Representatives gave me for my people what I had been seeking for twelve months—a fair, square investigation of these affairs in the State of Florida. I should never, from that moment until that distinguished body into whose hands the investigation was committed made a report, have raised my voice in this House on that subject. But the Attorney-General of the United States made it necessary for me to introduce this privileged resolution. I was content to let the whole affair go until this commission of Republicans and Democrats, all fair men, examined it, where the outraged people could meet these witnesses face to face and let the truth be evolved.

But the Attorney-General of the United States is not content with that, because he gives out to the Associated Press and sends upon the wires all over the civilized world the statement which, standing in my place and notwithstanding the defense of my friend, stamped him as absolutely unworthy of his high place at the head of the Department of Justice in this country.

He does not know any law. I do not hesitate to proclaim it. For the five years immediately preceding his entry into the Cabinet of the President, living within 40 miles of the Supreme Court of the United States, the name of this Attorney-General for those five years does not appear as counsel for anybody in any case in that great court of justice. He must have had a magnificent practice in Baltimore.

Further than that, Mr. Speaker, for the ten years immediately preceding his entry into the Cabinet, although he lived within forty minutes of the Supreme Court of the United States and a few minutes from the court of appeals of his own State of Maryland, with 3,400 cases disposed of in that court, his name does not appear but thirteen times on the record of the reported decisions, and in three of those he was a party to the suit, and in one of them the question at issue was 75 cents for repairs of a spigot in one of his houses that he had rented to a poor woman belonging to the laboring class.

A MEMBER. What has that got to do with it?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. It has got this to do with it, that this man is not fit to be Attorney-General of the United States because of his ignorance of the law. He is not fit because of this sentiment he sends out broadcast over the country.

I believe, Mr. Speaker, that any lawyer who ever had a criminal case will say that the objects of the criminal law are to punish the criminal; to reform the criminal; to set an example to others who might in like case offend, and to uphold the dignity and vindicate the majesty of the law. Those are the purposes of the criminal statutes.

But the Attorney-General has found a new principle. Here is what he says it is for:

Whenever the evidence justified a prosecution one has been ordered—

He does not know when it is justified!

although it is often difficult to secure a conviction, and sometimes even to secure an indictment, when the Department may be fully satisfied of the defendant's guilt. This is partly because the peons are usually dull, ignorant, and timid, and therefore make poor witnesses; partly because local prejudice sometimes renders it hard to select a really impartial grand or petit jury. Nevertheless, the Department believes that even unsuccessful prosecutions are useful in these cases—by enlightening and stimulating public opinion, and also by warning possible victims against dangerous neighborhoods.

It has been hinted that there was a conspiracy to keep labor from the South, and the Attorney-General in his statement admits it and admits that he is using the Department of Justice to further that conspiracy, because he is invoking the criminal law to warn people against "dangerous" communities. My friend says that this is a Republican Congress and ought not to permit the Department of Justice to be criticised. My friend did not mean that—he is too fair a man; but he says that Harlan has been convicted and is under sentence over at Pensacola. That is true. I want to tell him something else. Gentlemen may think, on account of my activity in this matter, that it is a partisan proposition. I want to tell you that W. S. Harlan is a Republican from the State of Iowa. I want to tell you that every man, practically, in my State who has been indicted is a Northern man and a Republican. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Not a native Floridan has been indicted, except one. He has been indicted in New York for a conspiracy to put people in peonage. I want to say to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CAULFIELD], and to that side of the House, that my whole action has been to defend Republicans in my State, and anybody else in my State, from the oppressive, outrageous means that have been used by this Department of Justice to bring them in ill repute, and to make them spend their hard earnings in defending themselves from prosecutions that were useless from the start and that had nothing in fact to stand upon. I want to say further that I do not take back one thing that I have said about John Cheney or Judge Locke. They are as good and true men as ever lived anywhere. But I want to tell the gentleman, when the Attorney-General took hold down there with his assistant, Russell, he had John Cheney and his assistant stand aside, and this assistant attorney-general managed things. I have not time to read that report that he made in February, 1907, and that was kept secret for more than a year, but in that report this man Russell starts out by saying that he is "a Southern man and a Democrat," and that he is going to enforce the laws, and he found various things, powerful people, entrenched behind these offenses, but he says he was not afraid. He is the hero of a dime-novel proposition. I wish to God every Member on this floor would read the infamous report of February 14, 1907, and which they kept secret, as I say, for more than a year.

Mr. Speaker, I was content, I say, until Bonaparte sent that thing out to the civilized world, in which he says that our people are semicivilized in the beginning of it, and in the other part that he is enforcing the criminal law, or attempting to do it, for purposes unheard of by any criminal lawyer until he sent it out on the wings of the electric wire. I want to say further, Mr. Speaker, that I am just as much opposed to peonage as is the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CAULFIELD]; I am just as much opposed to impressment upon the laborer as he is. Our people are just as much opposed to it as he; and if I wanted to say something, if I wanted to reflect upon my brethren from other States or upon their communities, I could do it; I could call attention to a few coal-mine horrors that never existed in our section of country; I could call attention to the sweat shops where white slaves under age are having their very lifeblood sapped in order that the rich, protected manufacturers who fill up your campaign treasury might be able to do it. I do not want to go into that realm of discussion.

We have had a Commission appointed. They will go there and we will have the investigation. We asked it because in the back room of the grand jury, an entirely ex parte proceeding, any man who was ever a prosecuting attorney and who ever went before a grand jury knows that the dictum of the prosecuting officer is often all that the grand jurors desire. It is notorious that indictments are frequently brought in because the prosecuting officer says to bring them in. Another thing, when you get before a petit jury, where both sides can be heard, where the jurors can look into the faces of all of the witnesses, it is a different matter; and when this Immigration Commission looks into the faces of the beautiful horde that Russell and Bonaparte have been transporting from Florida to New York and back and forth for immense mileage fees, that Immigration Commission will have no difficulty in making up what its report should be.

Mr. Speaker, I do not care to take up any further time. I say to the gentleman from Missouri, I say to this man Bonaparte, who disgraces his high place—and I do not hesitate to say it—I say to this man Russell, I say to the female Assistant Attorney-General and all the horde that follows in the wake of Bonaparte: Come down with the Immigration Commission to Florida; let the facts be brought out so that all the world may read and know the truth of the whole story. We have nothing to fear; we have invited it; we beg it; we are ready for it whenever your man Bonaparte is ready. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. CAULFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the resolution be laid on the table.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Speaker, I have no objection to the resolution being laid on the table.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the agricultural appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 19158), the agricultural appropriation bill, Mr. CAPRON in the chair.

Mr. GRIGGS. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment of the gentleman from Georgia.

Line 22, page 29——

Mr. GRIGGS. That is not the amendment. I am going to give it now. I will read it:

On page 29, lines 24 and 25, strike out the words "two hundred and four thousand seven hundred" and insert "three hundred and sixty-eight thousand one hundred and sixty."

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Georgia that the reading of the bill has not progressed so far as to permit that amendment to be offered.

Mr. GRIGGS. That paragraph has not been passed?

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment will be considered as pending when that paragraph of the bill is reached.

Mr. SCOTT. Do I understand the Chair to say the amendment is now in order?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that the reading of the bill has not progressed so far as will permit the incorporation of the amendment.

Mr. SCOTT. That is what I understood. I presume the gentleman will withdraw his amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

Total for Bureau of Soils, $204,700.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

Mr. GRIGGS. I offer the amendment which I have just read.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out the words "two hundred and four thousand seven hundred" and insert "three hundred and sixty-eight thousand one hundred sixty."

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I understand this amendment merely corrects the total in compliance with an amendment adopted yesterday. That being the case I have no objection.

The question was taken and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I wish to ask unanimous consent to return to page 26, line 8, to correct a title given there, "Bureau of Forestry." That service was for a time designated as the Bureau of Forestry. By change in the law last year that designation was made "Forest Service," but through inadvertence the old designation was carried in the present bill, and I ask unanimous consent to make the change.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kansas? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I want to ask the chairman of the committee a question. Five or six years ago Secretary Wilson sent his agents to my district and had soil analyses made—the matter which was talked about yesterday. I was very glad they enlarged the appropriation, for which I voted. Now, the little books, pamphlets, and pictures which they made of the soil, and all that sort of thing, are very valuable, of course, and there are no more of these pamphlets to be had. Our people want them. They are clamoring for them, and the farmers there, instead of growing practically one crop, since Secretary Wilson sent his experts down there and analyzed the soil and have told them where they can raise apples and various other fruits, corn, tobacco, and so forth, at a profit to them, have formed fruit associations of several kinds. They want this book and they can not get it. Now, why would it not be a good idea either to give these plates and the proofs to the people of that district, or to the State for the people or for us in this case to reprint these reports? Now, is there any way I can get relief for my people and other people in this fix under those circumstances?

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman could offer a resolution for a reprint, which would be referred to the Committee on Printing and could come before the House in the regular way, and I suggest that he do that.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Is there any provision now in this bill whereby that can be done without delay? I am willing to do that if I can get it through to-day in this bill.

Mr. SCOTT. There is no provision under present law. It would involve a change of existing law and would be out of order on this bill.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I will say to the gentleman that the Board of Trade of Clarksville, and people of Springfield, Ashland City, and other places in my district are writing to me. I even came here to see about it, and the Secretary has given all the reports he has, and I wish you would let me put an amendment in here covering that matter.

Mr. SCOTT. I think the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GAINES] will recognize that a matter of as much importance as that ought to proceed through the regular channels, and I can not agree——

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. You would not agree to it, then?

Mr. SCOTT. I am afraid I could not agree to it.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. You were so considerate yesterday that I will have to let you off, but I will introduce the resolution at once.

Mr. SCOTT. It is very kind of the gentleman to let me off.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I thank the gentleman for what he did yesterday, and the committee as well. I will insert here the law on the subject, which we must broaden.

Public resolution 9.

Joint resolution amending public resolution No. 9, Fifty-sixth Congress, second session, approved February 23, 1901, "providing for the printing annually of the report on field operations of the Division of Soils, Department of Agriculture."

Resolved, etc., That public resolution No. 9, Fifty-sixth Congress, second session, approved February 23, 1901, be amended by striking out all after the resolving clause and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"That there shall be printed 10,500 copies of the report on field operations of the Division of Soils, Department of Agriculture, of which 1,500 copies shall be for the use of the Senate, 3,000 copies for the use of the House of Representatives, and 6,000 copies for the use of the Department of Agriculture: Provided, That in addition to the number of copies above provided for there shall be printed as soon as the manuscript can be prepared, with the necessary maps and illustrations to accompany it, a report on each area surveyed, in the form of advance sheets, bound in paper covers, of which 500 copies shall be for the use of each Senator from the State, 2,000 copies for the use of each Representative for the Congressional district or districts in which the survey is made, and 1,000 copies for the use of the Department of Agriculture."

Approved March 14, 1904.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. SCOTT].

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 26, line 8, strike out "Bureau of Forestry" and insert "Forest Service."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Entomological investigations: General expenses, Bureau of Entomology: Promotion of economic entomology; investigating the history and habits of insects injurious and beneficial to agriculture, horticulture, and arboriculture; ascertaining the best means of destroying those found to be injurious, including an investigation into the ravages of insects affecting field crops; investigations of the insects affecting small fruit, shade trees, and truck crops, forests and forest products, and stored products; investigation of insects in relation to diseases of men and domestic animals, and as animal parasites; miscellaneous insect investigations, including tobacco insects; the introduction of beneficial insects, quarantine work, and the study of fungous and other diseases of insects; for the expenses of insect laboratory, collections, and experimental garden; investigations in apiculture; investigations of insecticides and insecticide machinery; for rent, and the employment of labor in the city of Washington and elsewhere; freight and express charges and official traveling expenses; for office fixtures, supplies, and apparatus; telegraph and telephone service; gas and electric current, $158,800, of which sum $10,000 shall be immediately available.

Mr. SCOTT rose.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. FOSTER of Vermont in the chair). For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. SCOTT. In order to permit the Commissioner from Porto Rico [Mr. LARRINAGA] to offer an amendment to the paragraph just read.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Porto Rico offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 1, page 31, after the word "machinery," insert "provided that Porto Rico is not excluded."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Total for Bureau of Entomology, $184,960.

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I would like to ask the chairman of the committee a question in reference to this. This section provides that the sum of $158,800 be appropriated for this Department, of which sum $10,000 shall be immediately available. What I wish to know is, is it understood that that $10,000 is to be used by the Department in reference to the suppression of the green bug and other grain pests in the West?

Mr. SCOTT. It was for that purpose that the language to which the gentleman refers has been inserted.

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. Is that understood by the Department?

Mr. SCOTT. That is the understanding between the Department and the committee.

The Clerk read as follows:

DIVISION OF PUBLICATIONS.

Salaries, Division of Publications: One editor, who shall be chief of division, $3,000; one editor, who shall be assistant chief of division, $2,250; one associate editor, $2,000; one assistant in charge of indexing, $1,800; four assistant editors, at $1,600; two editorial clerks, at $1,400 each; one assistant in charge of illustration, $2,000; one draftsman or photographer, $1,500; two draftsmen or photographers, at $1,400 each; one draftsman or photographer, $1,200; one chief clerk, $2,000; five clerks class 1; seven clerks, at $1,000 each; one assistant in charge document section, $2,000; one assistant in document section, $1,400; one assistant in document section, $1,200; one foreman, document section, $1,400; one foreman, farmers' bulletin distribution, $1,200; two forewomen, at $1,200 each; one clerk, now chief folder, $1,000; one clerk, now folder, $900; three folders, at $840 each; one clerk, $900; seven clerks, at $840 each; twenty-nine clerks, at $720 each; thirty-two clerks, at $600 each; one photographer, $1,200; one assistant photographer, $840; ten skilled laborers, at $840 each; eight skilled laborers, at $720 each; twenty skilled laborers, at $600 each; one messenger, $840; three messengers, at $720 each; three messengers, at $600 each; two messengers, at $420 each; one messenger boy, $360; one fireman, $720; in all, $136,550.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the paragraph, and I want to ask the chairman of the committee what the purpose of having the words "draftsman or photographer" is.

Mr. SCOTT. The purpose of that, Mr. Chairman, is to afford an opportunity for an alternation. Sometimes a draftsman is needed and sometimes a photographer is needed. It very often happens that the same man will be able to do work of both characters; but it was suggested that this change would afford a greater degree of flexibility in the service, and for that reason it was recommended.

Mr. MADDEN. A draftsman ordinarily might be able to do photographing, but a photographer might not in any case be able to do drafting. And it does not seem to me that the language ought to remain in the bill in this form. It seems to me that it will result in employing photographers next year, because a photographer can not do the drafting.

Mr. SCOTT. The present designation of this position is "one draftsman or clerk." As a matter of fact, the individual who occupies this position is not needed as a clerk. He is needed either as a draftsman or a photographer. In answer to precisely the question the gentleman has asked me, directed toward the Acting Chief of this Bureau, Mr. Arnold, he made this reply:

That is so as to make them interchangeable. Under the present designation a photographer can not be appointed to that position. In the case of a vacancy it may happen that we might have a greater need of a photographer than a draftsman. If the proposed change is made, we can fill the place with the one most needed at the time the vacancy occurs.

Mr. MADDEN. Does the gentleman in charge of the bill think it will result in the employment of two men where there is only one now?

Mr. SCOTT. I do not, for the reason that the present designation, as I say, is "one photographer or clerk," which calls for only one clerk.

Mr. MADDEN. I realize that under the present wording of the paragraph they can not employ two men; but might we not find it convenient to demand a change in the language next year so as to employ two, because we need both photographer and draftsman?

Mr. SCOTT. In this Bureau they already employ several photographers and draftsmen. A large amount of drafting and photographing is done in making maps and preparing pictures for various publications of the Department, so that I do not believe the small change in the wording suggested, by eliminating the word "clerk" and inserting "photographer," would involve any addition to the force that would not come otherwise.

Mr. MADDEN. You think it wise to let it remain?

Mr. SCOTT. I think it wise.

Mr. MADDEN. I will not make the point of order.

Mr. ADAIR. Does this bill make suitable provision for the publication of an increased number of farmers' bulletins? The farmers in my section of the country prize them very highly, and consider them of much value, and are very glad, indeed, to have them. I have understood that the appropriation heretofore made has not been sufficient to authorize the Department to issue an unlimited number of these bulletins for the use of the farmers.

Mr. SCOTT. Well, of course, the appropriation is not sufficient to permit the Department to issue "an unlimited number" of these publications; but in so far as the cost of the publications is paid for out of this appropriation, the committee is of the opinion that a sufficient sum is carried. The gentleman probably understands that all this appropriation bill carries in connection with the farmers' bulletins is simply the amount necessary to defray the expense of preparing these bulletins and distributing them. The cost of printing, amounting to $550,000 each year, is not carried in this bill, but in the sundry civil bill.

Mr. ADAIR. I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Publications, Department of Agriculture: General expenses, Division of Publications: For the preparation, illustration, publication, indexing, and distribution of documents, bulletins, and reports; for additional assistants, editorial, proof reading, indexing, and other necessary help in the city of Washington and elsewhere; for the pay of artists, draftsmen, and engravers; the purchase of manuscript for publication; for tools, instruments, and artists' materials; for drawings, engravings, electrotypes, photographs, paintings, lithographs, and other illustration work; for official traveling expenses; for labor and material required in the distribution of documents, including wagons, harness, and horses and maintenance of same, and for repairs; for rent in the city of Washington; for the pay of watchmen and charwomen; for all necessary office fixtures and supplies; for gas and electric current, telegraph and telephone services, and for such other expenses as may be necessary, $40,000.

Mr. McHENRY. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 35, line 19, insert the word "ninety" for the word "forty," so as to make it read "$90,000."

Mr. MADDEN. I make the point of order against that, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania desire to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. McHENRY. I will not speak on the point of order.

Mr. SCOTT. I would like to have the amendment reported again. I did not hear it.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will again report the amendment.

The amendment was again reported.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Illinois state his point of order?

Mr. MADDEN. I made a mistake in making the point of order, and withdraw it.

Mr. McHENRY. Mr. Chairman, no one can fail to be impressed with the good work being done by our national Agricultural Department, nor can anyone fail to be impressed with the utter inability of the Department, because of lack of funds, to disseminate the useful information which the Department has acquired.

Farming represents our basic industry, upon which all other industrial commercial activities are built. Any wise expenditure, therefore, upon the part of our National Government for the advancement of the farming industry of America is an expenditure which will bring to our National Treasury a thousandfold return.

I have feelings of the highest regard for the present Agricultural Bureau, under the direction of our able Secretary, Mr. Wilson, but I have absolutely no patience with the narrow penny-wise policy adopted by Congress for the dissemination of this information, which the Department has acquired at such great cost. If this Bureau is to be run in the interest of the American farmer, then they should be entitled to receive all the information and data collected by the Department. If, however, the Department is run for political purposes merely to create political jobs and in order that Congressmen and Senators may take care of their immediate friends in the distribution of bulletins and documents, then the present appropriation is entirely in keeping with the general policy of this Administration.

In this agricultural appropriation bill now under consideration you provide a fund for the maintenance of an Agricultural Bureau, with a total appropriation for the year of $11,430,346. In dividing up this appropriation you provide, under the head of "Publications," for the Department of Agriculture, for the preparation, illustration, publication, indexing, and distribution of documents, bulletins, and reports; for additional assistance, editorials, proof reading, and other necessary help in the city of Washington and elsewhere; for the pay of artists, draftsmen, and engravers; the purchase of manuscript for publication; for tools, instruments, and artists' materials; for drawings, engravings, electrotypes, photographs, paintings, lithographs, and other illustrative work; for official traveling expenses, for labor and material required in the distribution of documents, including wagons, harness, and horses, and maintenance of same, and for repairs; for rent in the city of Washington; for the pay of watchmen and charwomen; for all necessary office fixtures and supplies, for gas and electric current, telegraph and telephone service, and for such other expenses as may be necessary, $40,000.

With a total expenditure of eleven millions and a half for the Agricultural Department, and from which an allowance of $40,000 is made for the dissemination of information to the public, allows an expenditure of $1,000 for collecting information, and $3 for the purpose of giving that information to the public. It must be apparent to you gentlemen upon the other side that in this paltry appropriation you are applying false principles of economy. I am not asking for any reduction of any part of the appropriation, but, on the contrary, have voted for every increase asked for, for I firmly believe that the benefit derived by the agricultural interests will more than offset any possible extravagance there might be in the Department. I have not even raised any objection to the appropriation of $240,000 for seeds, which I am perfectly free to say I look upon as a direct bid for public patronage and, in the most cases, a willful extravagance, but I have been willing to pass that provision of the bill this year.

My amendment which asks for a larger amount of money to be applied to the dissemination of information is infinitely more important to the country at large than any other part of this bill. The fixed charges of the organization of this Bureau have already been met. The cost of an experiment, whether it is for the information of one farmer or for the information of a million farmers, is just the same as far as the original cost is concerned, and as compared with the original cost and the benefits which will come from this work the additional cost of printing and distributing bulletins is comparatively small.

I feel, Mr. Chairman, that every farmer in the United States, whether he is a Democrat or a Republican, whether he is a landlord or a tenant, should have the privilege of receiving from the National Government the information which the Department has gleaned and which has been paid for by the American taxpayers. I propose that every farmer and every citizen within my district shall, through me, have access to this information, and shall be entitled to receive all bulletins and documents issued by the Agricultural Department who want them, and it is both unfair to the distinguished Secretary as well as unfair to the farmer himself that when a man writes in and wants one of these little bulletins, insignificant in their cost but important in the valuable information they contain, that this great Government shall say to that farmer—and spend more time and money in dictating a letter to a typewriter explaining that they are out of print than the actual cost of printing—that the allotment has all been exhausted and that they can not be further supplied.

I want this appropriation made, and if the requisitions do not come from the people to exhaust it, it will remain unused and can be carried over into the next year; but it is there for the farmers' benefit, if needed, and I do not want the Department to be put into a position where it must refuse the granting of these ordinary requests. If we are sincere in our purpose to maintain this Bureau for the benefit of the farmer and not merely for the purpose of giving jobs to a favored few, then we must make this information available to the average farmer. With the production of American farms approximating an annual amount of $7,000,000,000, with the farmer to-day as the only man or class of men during this time of panic who are bringing money from Europe from the sale of their crops and keeping the balance of trade in our favor, we Representatives here in Congress fail in our duty to our country in refusing to permit the highest possible degree of cooperation for bringing about the greatest good to the greatest number.

A full set of these farmers' bulletins and publications should be in every public school library in the United States. In my district I have 1,059 public schools. The Department has issued a total of 350 bulletins. So, if you were to supply the schools alone in my district, it would take 370,650 bulletins. Under the present rule you allow each Congressman 10,000 bulletins, allowing me one little bulletin for each farmer in my district.

I have gone over the list carefully and selected 110 bulletins that apply to Pennsylvania farmers, and if I were to furnish every farmer in my district the bulletins which he has a right to receive, and which, from a true economic standpoint, he ought to receive, it would take eleven hundred thousand bulletins for my district, and under the present penny method it would take three hundred years to supply each farmer in my district with each bulletin issued by the Department to date.

Your distributing appropriation provides an allowance, after deducting rents and helpers' expenses, of about $50 for each Congressional district, or less than $10 for each county. Mr. Chairman, the addressing and mailing of one franked letter to the voters of my district costs over $100, so it is easy to see how utterly inadequate this appropriation is, and I trust there will be no opposition to the amendment I have offered.

The mere establishment of a Bureau or Department of Agriculture is not sufficient. It must be brought closer to the farmer. The Bureau should report its findings not only to Congress, but to the people, and the only medium for transmitting this information to the farmers direct is through the agency of this bulletin service. No bulletin should ever be allowed to go out of print, and the Department should be furnished ample means to place the results of its scientific research and experiments in the hands of every farmer, and in this way through these millions of farmers the soil will give an immediate response and an increased national earning beyond comparison, and so vast as to make opposition to this expenditure little short of a national crime.

It is urged by the committee, Mr. Chairman, that we must cut down expenses because of falling revenues. I admit the truth of this statement and will be glad to cooperate for this result, and am glad that this Republican House realizes this necessity and the conditions which have created it and which have grown out of a Republican policy of tariff and trust domination.

But, Mr. Chairman, the place to begin economizing is not with the farmers and laborers of this country, which represent our creative and productive energy. Let us spend less money for destruction and more money for production.

In the prosperity of agriculture the hope of the people rests. Industrial interests may be perverted by frenzied financiers into instruments of woe and the vast transportation enterprises manipulated for evil by "malefactors of great wealth." But agriculture is an element in the productive energy of the country which never has and never can be turned to detrimental uses. It is the staff upon which, in the last analysis, we all lean. It is our duty, therefore, to foster and conserve it in every way. Last year the value of the farm products of the country reached the magnificent aggregate of $7,000,000,000. Significant as these figures are they do not represent nearly the possibilities of the soil. With scientific treatment and industrious effort this total can be increased by from 25 to 40 per cent. That result achieved, the prosperity of the country will be raised beyond the reach of speculators to impair or the power of wreckers to destroy. It is for this result that I am pleading.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, the Department only asks $40,000 for the work that is provided for in this paragraph, and the committee have given the Department all it asked for. Last year they only spent $35,000. This year the committee have recommended the appropriation of $40,000. Now, the gentleman is asking that $90,000 be appropriated. For what? The Department does not do any printing of farmers' bulletins. It only prepares the manuscripts; it does the editing. It does not need $90,000, it could not use it, it would not know what to do with it. Why should this House be called upon to appropriate $50,000 more than the Department asks, and $50,000 more than it has been granted at its own request? It seems to me we ought to go slow about increasing appropriations in this way. The revenues of the country are declining every day and the expenditures are increasing. The gentlemen on the other side of the aisle are always anxious to make large appropriations, and then find fault with the Republican side of the House because it is extravagant.

Mr. LAMB. There is no politics in this bill.

Mr. MADDEN. No; there never is any politics in a bill, but there is always politics after it has passed. This ought not to be allowed, in my judgment.

Mr. SCOTT and Mr. WILLIAMS addressed the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman recognizes the gentleman from Kansas, chairman of the Committee on Agriculture.

Mr. SCOTT. I move that debate close on this amendment in three minutes, and I want one of those minutes.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, I would be forced to resist that motion. I think I want about five minutes on it myself.

Mr. SCOTT. The gentleman from Mississippi asks five minutes, and I will modify my motion and move that debate close in seven minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas moves that all debate on this amendment close in seven minutes.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, the last remark of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] comes at a queer time and from a queer source. If the Republican party wants to economize, the Democratic party will help it, but it had better economize upon waste and not upon investment. It had better economize upon things that are useless expenditures or worse than useless—militarism and things that threaten the peace of the country, and not economize upon the internal development of the country and the spread of information amongst the farmers of the country. [Applause.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, I served upon the Agricultural Committee, I think, for twelve years. I was senior Democratic Member of that committee for six of those years, as I now remember. My experience upon that committee teaches me that no part of the work of the Department of Agriculture itself here in Washington (I am not speaking now of the work of the experimental stations and the field work)—no part of the work of the Department here is of one-half as much importance as the preparation, editing, and publication of farmers' bulletins, each little bulletin giving to the farmer as nearly complete information as the Department can give upon some one particular subject of plant culture, plant growth, selection of seed, harvesting, fertilization, or what not. We were talking a great deal yesterday about soil maps. Soil mapping is of immense profit and importance, but I was never worried by people who wanted maps of the soil.

I was worried a little bit about getting the maps out, but when it comes to farmers' bulletins, especially upon certain particular subjects—the cultivation of corn, for example; hog cholera, alfalfa, cotton fertilization, and a great many others that I might mention now—I have never had enough, and I do not believe anybody has. I would vote to add even more than the gentleman from Pennsylvania proposes to this appropriation in order to increase the number of farmers' bulletins. Now, to show the misapprehension that sometimes arises in the minds of some, Mr. Chairman, I desire to say that the clause to which this is an amendment reads as follows:

For the preparation, illustration, publication, indexing, and distribution of documents, bulletins, and reports.

I do not believe, Mr. Chairman, that $50,000 of increase to the expenditures of the Government can be made in any bureau of any Department, in connection with any work of the entire Federal Government as usefully as $50,000 more applied to the simple business of preparing, publishing, and distributing farmers' bulletins.

Mr. SCOTT. Does not the gentleman think that the Division of Publications, with the advice and consent of the Secretary of Agriculture, has a pretty good idea of the amount of money they need for this purpose?

Mr. WILLIAMS. The Division of Publications has a very good idea, but there are a whole lot of other bureaus down there—the Bureau of Plant Industry, the Bureau of Biology, the Bureau of Entomology, the Bureau of Soils, and all the other bureaus—and when it comes to a contest between them as to which shall get the larger part of the appropriation, or how the distribution of the appropriation going to the general expenditure of the Department of Agriculture is to go, the Bureau of Publications never has had its proper share, because, after all, the chief good done by the Department of Agriculture is not confined to its work, but to the distribution of information about its work.

I have no doubt that the chief of the Bureau of Publications, or any other chief for that matter, would have asked for more if he had not thought it would conflict with other people getting more than what they asked for.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I will yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman understand that this appropriation, if increased, would increase the quota of farmers' bulletins allotted to Members of Congress for distribution?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Undoubtedly; it would increase the quantity and therefore increase the quota. The increased quantity would have to be distributed.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from Mississippi is mistaken; it would not make any change at all.

Mr. LAMB. Does not the gentleman from Mississippi think we have enough now?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not.

Mr. LAMB. I do.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I am indebted to the gentleman from Illinois, a member of the Committee on Appropriations, who has come to the aid of the Committee on Agriculture, and the explanation he has given has been so clear and complete that little is left for me to say. The gentleman from Mississippi is entirely mistaken in assuming that an increase of this appropriation would give any Member of the House a single additional bulletin to distribute. The fund for these bulletins is carried in the sundry civil appropriation bill, as I stated in reply to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, and amounts to $550,000. If we added $100,000 to this appropriation for the Bureau of Publications it would not give us a single additional bulletin.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If this language does not mean what it says, what does it mean? It says "preparation, illustration, publication, indexing, and distribution of bulletins."

Mr. SCOTT. The gentleman from Mississippi must not take my time to ask such questions as that, which, as a former member of the committee, he ought to understand. The only word that he has read that would indicate what he contends for is the word "publication," and that is used, as you might say, in a professional sense. The Bureau of Publications submitted an estimate for $40,000, $5,000 of which they say was in order to purchase an addressing machine to take the place of some twenty-five or thirty people writing out addresses in longhand. The committee recommended exactly what the Bureau asked for, and in doing that it believes that it fulfilled the necessities of this Bureau.

The gentleman from Mississippi suggests that the bureau chief did not ask for all the money he wanted for fear that he might interfere with what the other bureaus were asking for. That shows a spirit of altruism that has not been exhibited to any great extent in the Department of Agriculture. [Laughter.] Mr. Chairman, I ask for a vote.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend the amendment by adding after the word "dollars" the words "$50,000 thereof to be devoted exclusively to the preparation, publication, and distribution of farmers' bulletins."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add to the amendment the following: "Fifty thousand dollars thereof to be devoted exclusively to the preparation, publication, and distribution of farmers' bulletins."

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order to that, that the amendment properly belongs to the sundry civil bill, where the fund for the publication of these bulletins is carried.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, I want to be heard on the point of order, unless the Chair does not desire to hear me.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The gentleman can make the point of order only on the ground that it is new legislation or a change of existing law or not germane. The clause to which this is an amendment—and it is an amendment merely increasing the amount—is a clause "for the preparation, illustration, publication, indexing, and distribution of documents, bulletins, and reports."

Now, it provides in this very language, which I have read, for the preparation and publication and distribution of farmers' bulletins. My amendment is to increase the amount. The paragraph, it is true, also provides "for additional assistance, editorial, proof reading, indexing, and other necessary help in the city of Washington and elsewhere," and so forth. In other words, this clause provides "for the preparation, publication, and distribution of bulletins," and, in addition to that, provides that the money therein appropriated shall be expended for other purposes also. The amendment is simply to increase the amount, and provides that the $50,000 of increase shall go exclusively to providing for the issuing of these bulletins under existing law.

That is the amount of increase, to wit, $50,000 to be localized in the preparation, publication, and distribution of bulletins. It is not a change of existing law, it is not new legislation; it is germane, and there is no possible point of order that can lie to it. The gentleman's proposition is that the sundry civil appropriation bill carries an appropriation for farmers' bulletins. Suppose that it does. What has that to do with the question of the germaneness of the change of existing law involved in an amendment to a part of this bill which in its very language also makes provision "for the preparation, publication, and distribution of bulletins?" The fact that there is other existing law, to wit, in the sundry civil, to which it might also have been germane, does not weaken, but strengthens my argument.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, the current sundry civil law carries this item:

For the Department of Agriculture, including not to exceed $25,000 for the Weather Bureau, and including the annual report of the Secretary of Agriculture as required by the act approved January 12, 1895, and in pursuance of the provisions of public resolution No. 13 of the first session of the Fifty-ninth Congress, and also including not to exceed $98,750 for farmers' bulletins, which shall be adapted to the interests of the people of the different sections of the country, an equal proportion of four-fifths of which shall be delivered or sent out under the address franks furnished by Senators, Representatives, and Delegates in Congress, as they shall direct, $433,750.

It is possible that the amendment proposed might be in order if authorization is already made for the publication of these farmers' bulletins, but it is perfectly plain that if the object sought to be attained is the increase of the quota of Members of Congress it would be subject to the point of order. That item is carried in the sundry civil appropriation bill, and under the rules of the House comes in the appropriation relating to the Printing Office. It is subject to the jurisdiction of the Committee on Appropriations and not subject to the jurisdiction of the Committee on Agriculture, and not being subject to their jurisdiction, an amendment to their bill, as I take it, would be subject to the point of order; and I would like in this connection to call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that even if his amendment prevails, it would not add a single farmers' bulletin to the quota of Members of Congress.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Well, we will risk that.

Mr. MANN. Their quota must necessarily be governed by the item in the sundry civil appropriation bill. I take it that the amendment is a matter that relates to the appropriation of the Printing Office; the item in the bill is a matter that relates to the preparation of the original publication of farmers' bulletins; but the item for the publication of farmers' bulletins for distribution, under the rules and law and practice of the House, relates to the appropriation for the Printing Office. That belongs to the jurisdiction of the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. WANGER. Would not the additional appropriation enable the Secretary of Agriculture to put a large number of bulletins subject to the control of Members of Congress?

Mr. MANN. He would have no authority under the law to do that. The law on the subject is carried in the sundry civil appropriation bill, and the Committee on Appropriations has jurisdiction of all the items in relation to the Public Printing Office. I take it that we can not divide the jurisdiction of appropriations for the Public Printing Office between the different appropriation committees of the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would like to inquire of the chairman of the committee whether this appropriation of $40,000 covers the expense of printing.

Mr. SCOTT. None of it whatever is expended for printing, Mr. Chairman. It is all expended for the preparation of the material to be printed and in the distribution of publications.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would like to ask the chairman of the committee whether there is authorization for this preparation, illustration, publication, and distribution of documents.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I think that is carried clearly in the general act, which authorizes the Secretary to diffuse and disseminate useful information. I beg to call the attention of the Chair to the fact that last year there was an item for the preparation and printing of farmers' bulletins carried in this bill, but it was stricken out of this bill upon the recommendation of the Committee on Printing and included in the printing bill. It seems to me, therefore, that Congress has already passed upon this matter, and that the amendment under consideration would change the law which Congress enacted last year.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, it may have been the intent of somebody somewhere to strike out of this bill the publication of these bulletins, but if it was, the intent never was carried into effect, because the word "publication" is still left in here, and it can not bear any other meaning in common sense except that of publishing, and there is no way of publishing except by printing.

Mr. SCOTT. The gentleman knows that the cost of printing is as a matter of fact paid——

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not care what the practice is. The question is whether it is a change of existing law.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is prepared to rule. This amendment simply increases the amount of the appropriation and localizes a portion of the appropriation. Now, the Chair believes that no one contends that it would not be entirely proper for the House to state specifically just how much of this $40,000 should be used for each of the purposes mentioned in this paragraph. That is all that this amendment undertakes to do. It is simply an amendment of the description of the appropriation, and the Chair overrules the point of order. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Mississippi to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the noes seemed to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. WILLIAMS) there were—ayes 46, noes 48.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, I call for tellers.

Tellers were ordered.

The committee again divided, and the tellers (Mr. SCOTT and Mr. WILLIAMS) announced that there were—ayes 63, noes 65.

So the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking the chairman of the committee a question. In line 24 there is a provision for the purchase of manuscript for publication. Does this mean that the Secretary can go and purchase articles prepared by individuals outside of the service?

Mr. SCOTT. That is what it means. Mr. Chairman, there are a great many men working in the various colleges and universities throughout the country on agricultural subjects who frequently, not frequently, but occasionally, are better prepared to write a farmers' bulletin upon some given topic than anybody in the Department of Agriculture is. The authority has therefore been carried in the bill for several years to permit the Secretary in his discretion to buy articles thus prepared by outsiders. I may say, however, that this authority has been very sparingly exercised. It is thought best to carry the language in the bill merely to give the Secretary that authority in case some specially valuable manuscript is offered; and it does not involve any special expenditure.

Mr. JONES of Washington. The gentleman says it has been sparingly used. Now, in lines 21 and 22 its says "for additional assistants, editorial, proof reading, indexing, etc." What is the significance of that word "editorial" there?

Mr. SCOTT. All of the manuscripts which are submitted for publication as coming from the Department of Agriculture, no matter in what bureau they are prepared, come to this Division of Publications to be edited and prepared for the press. There are editors on this roll whose business it is to read these manuscripts, to eliminate matters that they think are extraneous and unnecessary, make changes in the form in which they are submitted and in a general way exercise the editorial function.

Mr. JONES of Washington. It has no reference to newspaper work whatever?

Mr. SCOTT. None whatever.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

Mr. McHENRY. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. SCOTT. On the subject of the amendment offered by the gentleman?

Mr. McHENRY. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The Clerk read as follows:

Collecting agricultural statistics: General expenses, Bureau of Statistics: Collecting domestic and foreign agricultural statistics, compiling, writing, and illustrating statistical matter for monthly, annual, and special reports; special investigations and compilations; purchase of supplies; telegraph and telephone service; freight and express charges; employment of labor in the city of Washington and elsewhere; official traveling and other expenses: Provided, That the monthly crop reports, which shall be gathered as far as practicable from practical farmers and which shall be issued on or before the 10th of each month, shall embrace statements of the conditions of the crops by States, in the United States, with such explanations, comparisons, and information as may be useful for illustrating the above matter, and that it shall be submitted to and officially approved by the Secretary of Agriculture before being issued or published: Provided further, That the condition reports of the cotton crop shall be issued on the same day in October each year as the first ginners' report of actual cotton ginned, $125,000.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, and I would like to ask the chairman of the committee whether all this language in lines 11 and 12, page 36, after the word "reports," "which shall be gathered as far as practicable from practical farmers," is of any advantage in the bill?

Mr. SCOTT. Well, personally I am obliged to say that I do not think the language is of any advantage to the bill, because, as a matter of fact, there are many thousands of practical farmers now reporting to this Bureau. The language in question was very earnestly asked for by certain gentlemen who appeared before the committee, and inserted because, in the opinion of the committee, it would not injure the bill in any way and would not entail any additional expense.

Mr. MADDEN. All right.

The CHAIRMAN. The pro forma amendment will be considered as withdrawn. [After a pause.] The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. POLLARD. I renew the motion to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. POLLARD] renews the motion.

Mr. POLLARD. Mr. Chairman, during the course of the discussion upon the bill yesterday and the day before there were certain serious charges made against the Forestry Service which to my mind ought to receive some attention. Consequently I wrote a letter to the chief of this Service and requested him to make such explanation as he cared to in regard to these charges. Now, I desire to print in the RECORD the letters I wrote Mr. Pinchot, and his reply. I do not care to take up the time of the House to read them, but simply want to have them printed in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The letters are as follows:

COMMITTEE ON AGRICULTURE,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., March 31, 1908.

Hon. GIFFORD PINCHOT,
Chief of the Bureau of Forestry, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: In view of the fact that certain serious charges have been made against your management of the Forest Service in the House while your Bureau was under consideration, I desire to call your attention to two or three that, to my mind, are the most important, and to request an explanation from you.

First, it is charged that the Forest Service has paid for newspaper or magazine articles to advertise its work, in an unwarranted manner. Second, that the public funds have been used for publishing in the newspapers and in periodicals attacks on public men who differ with your management of the Forest Service and venture a criticism of your policies. Third, it is charged that whenever a convention is called of stockmen to discuss questions of general interest to stock growers, your Service sends representatives from Washington and from different parts of the country in great numbers in order to control these conventions.

I would be glad to have you write me fully, giving whatever explanation you care to offer in refutation of these charges.

Very truly, yours,

ERNEST M. POLLARD.

UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
FOREST SERVICE,
Washington, April 1, 1908.

Hon. ERNEST M. POLLARD,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. POLLARD: Your letter of March 31 asks certain questions which I am exceedingly glad to answer. First, as to whether the Forest Service has paid for newspaper or magazine articles to advertise its work. Neither the Forest Service, nor I personally, have ever paid one cent, directly or indirectly, either to procure the insertion of material of any kind in any publication of any sort concerning the Forest Service, or its policy or work, or to influence the judgment of any newspaper or magazine man upon them, or to secure the writing of newspaper or magazine articles by collaborators or any other persons not regular members of the Service. This, of course, does not apply to advertisements for bids for the sale of timber, or other advertisements which are required by law.

Secondly, as to whether the Forest Service has instigated attacks on public men who were opposed to its policies. Neither the Forest Service, nor I personally, have ever instigated or procured attacks on any man, nor have ever brought or tried to bring pressure to bear on Members of Congress in reference to legislation concerning the Service. It is obvious that the existence of strong popular support of the Forest Service and its policies, based on general popular knowledge of the national need for forestry, which has led to vigorous defense of the forest policy when it has been attacked, has been wrongly attributed to a subsidized press. On the contrary, the Forest Service, and I personally, have repeatedly declined to have anything to do with matter which might be construed as an attack upon anyone. The Forest Service has confined itself strictly to questions of fact lying within its province.

The statements to which you refer are, in effect, charges of misuse of public funds and therefore of dishonesty against the Forest Service and against me personally, and to that extent they are unqualifiedly false. The same charges which are made against the Forest Service are necessarily made at the same time against the newspaper men, with whom, if the charges are true, the Forest Service must be in collusion. It is obvious to anyone who will consider the matter for a moment that the character, intelligence, and news sense of Washington and other correspondents, and of every editor and writer who has ever made use of our material, is the most effective possible barrier to any such scheme of work as the Forest Service has been charged with. The surest way to prevent any fair consideration of the work of the Forest Service by the press generally would be to attempt just such a campaign of puffing or exaggeration as has been charged. No newspaper man has ever received material from the Forest Service who did not know that it came from the Forest Service, nor would a newspaper of any standing print matter from an unknown source, were it sent out.

The policy and method of publicity which the Forest Service has developed is, to my mind, the only defensible policy for any Government organization, any part of whose purpose is to collect and disseminate facts. Every consideration of economy, promptness, and efficiency requires that the information gathered at the public expense should be put in the hands of the people, who pay for it, as promptly, as cheaply, and as widely as possible. You can not reach a population of 80,000,000 with 10,000 copies of a bulletin, whose publication must always be somewhat retarded and in which there is often more material than the average man cares to read. To get information before the public through the newspapers by the methods in use in this Service costs less than 1 per cent of the expense of getting the same information as widely distributed in public documents. Without the active cooperation of the press, which this method seeks to secure, the general knowledge of the value of forestry which now exists among our people would have been altogether impossible.

The attendance of forest officers at public meetings in the West was investigated last year by the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Agriculture. The policy which I explained then is the same that obtains now. When considerable bodies of users of the national forests come together it is the custom of the Forest Service to meet them, almost invariably at their own request, for discussion of policies and settlements of difficulties, and in consultation with local people to devise methods of administration calculated to make the national forests more useful and more easily used. I believe this is a good thing to do, and I propose to continue it unless otherwise ordered. I can see no reason why the people of the West should not be entitled to know at first hand what the Forest Service is doing and to have their complaints, criticisms, and suggestions considered and discussed with them, both by the local forest officers and the men from Washington. I inclose a copy of the Littlefield report.

The details of expenditures for travel, like those for every other purpose, are on file in the Forest Service and can be supplied within the time necessary to copy them.

Very sincerely, yours,

GIFFORD PINCHOT,
Forester.

The Clerk read as follows:

LIBRARY.

Salaries, library, Department of Agriculture: One librarian, $2,000; one assistant librarian, $1,400; one clerk (who shall be a translator), $1,200; two cataloguers, at $1,200 each; three cataloguers, at $1,000 each; one clerk, $1,000; four clerks, at $900 each; one clerk, $840; two clerks, at $720 each; one messenger, $720; one messenger or laborer, $480; in all, $18,080.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I have great confidence in the committee in charge of this bill, but, I suppose, because I am ignorant as to the details, this item of allowance for the library strikes one as being very large. There can not be a large library belonging to this Department, and $18,000 for clerks is sufficient for the furnishing of a vastly larger library than this, I suppose, can be.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, there is a very large library in the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. PERKINS. How large?

Mr. SCOTT. It is the largest agricultural library in the world.

Mr. PERKINS. And how many volumes?

Mr. SCOTT. I am unable to answer exactly, but a good many thousand volumes. The work which requires the large clerical force to which the gentleman has called attention grows out of the fact that the library is receiving not only from this country, but from every other civilized country, a vast number of publications of a technical nature, many of them containing a good deal of valuable information, all of which have to be catalogued in order, of course, to be made of any value. It requires a large force, a comparatively large force, to keep track of all those publications and have their contents made available to the use of the investigator.

Mr. PERKINS. How much has this item been increased in the last two years?

Mr. SCOTT. Just a moment. The gentleman must understand that the Department of Agriculture is the great scientific Department of this Government. There are in the neighborhood of 2,000 scientists there engaged in technical investigations along all the different lines which contribute to the welfare of agriculture and its kindred interests. These men make daily use of the library, as a matter of course. The gentleman is better qualified than nearly any of us in this Chamber to pass judgment upon the necessity of a library to any scientist engaged in research work, and the committee feels that the appropriation in this bill is moderate, rather than liberal, in taking care of this library. The ranking Member of the minority [Mr. LAMB] and myself visited the library and spent several hours there carefully inquiring into the work. The appropriation for the library has not been growing at all rapidly for several years past. The appropriation for the fiscal year 1905 was $20,200; for 1906 it was $21,040; for 1907, $25,880; for 1908, $28,380, and for 1909, $33,580.

Mr. PERKINS. How much of that increase has been by purchase of publications and how much for increase of salaries?

Mr. SCOTT. Most of it has been for the purchase of publications until this year. This year the increase, which is larger than formerly, provides for the employment of additional assistants, because the investigation, which the chairman of the committee and other members made, thoroughly convinced them that the present force is not sufficient to keep up with the publications which are being received and maintain the library at its full standard of usefulness.

Mr. PERKINS. If the gentleman has made full inquiry, I have no desire to criticise or say anything further.

The Clerk read as follows:

Library, Department of Agriculture: General expenses, library: Purchase of technical books of reference, technical papers, and technical periodicals necessary for the work of the Department, and for expenses incurred in completing imperfect series, and for the employment of additional assistance in the city of Washington and elsewhere; for official traveling expenses, and for library fixtures, library cards, and other material, $15,500: Provided, That section 3648 of the Revised Statutes shall not apply to the subscriptions for publications for the Department of Agriculture, and the Secretary of Agriculture is authorized to pay in advance for any publications for the use of this Department. And hereafter the Secretary of Agriculture may furnish to such institutions or individuals as may care to buy them, copies of the card index of the publications of the Department and of other agricultural literature prepared by the library, and charge for the same a price covering the additional expense involved in the preparation of these copies.

Mr. DRISCOLL. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order on that part of this paragraph commencing with the word "provided," on line 21, page 37, down to "Department," on line 1, page 38. It seems to me that is a change of existing law, and I want to ask what is the meaning of it?

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, this provision has been carried in the bill for a number of years, and is inserted there for the reason that it is necessary, in order that the library may have its greatest usefulness, that a great many foreign publications should be received, and a great many other publications for which payment is required in advance.

Mr. DRISCOLL. Is it not true that two copies of all publications are required to be deposited in the Congressional Library?

Mr. SCOTT. I believe all publications that are copyrighted in this country are required to be deposited in the Congressional Library, but this is not a part of the Congressional Library.

Mr. DRISCOLL. Does this provide that it shall not be done in these cases?

Mr. MANN. I can tell the gentleman what the section of the Revised Statutes is. It is that one which forbids any Department of the Government from paying out any money in advance for anything it purchases.

Mr. SCOTT. I supposed the gentleman understood that.

Mr. MANN. In other words, if this section is not inserted the Department can not pay a subscription for a magazine until the end of the current year for which it ordered it, and in no case can it order a magazine and pay for it in advance. This provision is in every appropriation bill authorizing subscriptions.

Mr. SCOTT. And I would add that under the present ruling of the Third Assistant Postmaster General it would be impossible for the publisher to send it longer than three months after the subscription had expired.

The Clerk read as follows:

CONTINGENT EXPENSES.

Contingent expenses, Department of Agriculture: Purchase of stationery, blank books, twine, paper, gum, dry goods, soap, brushes, brooms, mats, oils, paints, glass, lumber, hardware, ice, fuel, water and gas pipes, heating apparatus, furniture, carpets, matting; for lights, freight, express charges, advertising, telegraphing, washing towels, and necessary repairs and improvements to buildings and heating apparatus; the purchase, subsistence, and care of horses, for official purposes only; the purchase and repair of harness; the purchase and repair of vehicles, for official purposes only; payment of duties on imported articles, and the Department of Agriculture's proportionate share of the dispatch agent in New York, not to exceed $400; official traveling expenses; and other miscellaneous supplies and expenses not otherwise provided for, and necessary for the practical and efficient work of the Department, including not to exceed $2,500 for postage, and also including not to exceed $25,000 for the installation of power-plant machinery to furnish power and light for the new buildings of the Department in the city of Washington, $78,200.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order against that part of the paragraph beginning with the word "and," in line 2, page 39, and running down to the word "Washington," in line 5, page 40. My purpose in reserving the point of order is to state that provision is already made for the amount of money required to construct the electric-light and heating plant, and this appropriation is in excess of the limit of cost fixed in the original legislation.

Mr. PERKINS. I reserve the point of order to the word "buildings," on line 17, page 39.

Mr. SCOTT. Do I understand the gentleman to say that provision for the installation of the electric-light plant is already made?

Mr. MADDEN. They are already made, and appropriations were made for it, the gentleman will find, in the Statutes at Large, volume 32, page 806.

Mr. FITZGERALD. This is in excess of the limit of cost.

Mr. SCOTT. What is the date of that act, please?

Mr. FITZGERALD. It is the act of February 9, 1903.

Mr. SCOTT. I understand, then, Mr. Chairman, that objection is now made to permitting this appropriation on the ground that it exceeds the limit of cost of the original act for the construction of the buildings. I am of the opinion, Mr. Chairman, that the machinery provided for in the paragraph under consideration was not necessarily included in the description of the building to which the gentleman alludes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The act says "limit of cost of construction of said building complete, including heating and ventilating apparatus, elevators, and approaches," etc.

Mr. SCOTT. Will the gentleman please read the "et cetera." He has not yet read any language which would cover this case.

Mr. FITZGERALD. "And cost of removal of present building."

Mr. SCOTT. Does the gentleman say that the language there provided for the installation of the power plant and for generating electric current?

Mr. MANN. It is not there.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, the act provides that the building shall be "complete in all its details."

Mr. SCOTT. Well, the gentleman knows, does he not, that the law provides that no power plant shall be installed in a public building in the city of Washington unless the Secretary of the Treasury certifies that the power can be supplied in this way more cheaply than through the use of the current furnished by public power plants? So the building might be "complete in all its details" and yet not contain a lighting plant.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I wish to call the attention of the gentleman to this fact: That at the last session of Congress the Secretary of the Treasury was directed to submit a report to Congress as to what it would be possible to make a contract to light all the public buildings in the city of Washington for. He reports that it will be possible for him to make a contract at the rate of 2½ cents per kilowatt hour. It is costing the Government in its own power plants from 5 to 15 cents per kilowatt hour, and it seems to me it is time to stop installing separate plants and paying prices to that extent, when people are ready to do the same service at 2½ cents. The report is in the form of a document and has been printed.

This power plant either is not authorized by law and it is proposed to change this act or to provide for expending money in excess of the amount limited for this building.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield to me, on the point whether it is authorized by law or not. I think it is plain that the original act does cover the cost of power and light.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I think the gentleman is entirely mistaken. I read one section, but there are two others.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will suggest that the gentleman read them so that we may have no question about what is authorized by law.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I will submit it to the Chair. It is quite long.

Mr. MANN. While the gentleman is looking that up, now, if I may have his attention—and he is able to do two things at once, I know—we fixed a limit of cost, for instance, on the new House Office Building. Does that include the power and light plant? Not at all.

Mr. FITZGERALD. If it had provided that it should be complete in all of its details, I should say it did. A building without light and power certainly is not complete in all its details.

Mr. MANN. Now, as a matter of fact, I suppose the new plant for the Office Building will not be in the House Office Building at all, and I imagine that if this is authorized the new plant for the power and lighting machinery for the Agricultural building will not be in that building, or, as they call it here, "those buildings."

Mr. FITZGERALD. It should be "that building," but it is "those buildings."

Mr. MANN. The law provides for that building, but this bill would say "those buildings." Now, the gentleman says we are awaiting the action of the Secretary of the Treasury as to the relative cost of furnishing the power ourselves or purchasing it, but we are not doing that as to the Office Building and the Capitol building. We propose to erect a power plant down south of the Office Building several blocks to furnish the power and the light and the heat for the Office Building and for the Capitol building.

Mr. FITZGERALD. That is true.

Mr. MANN. If we do that for ourselves, why should we draw the line at the Agricultural Department? Why should we say that they should go cold or in the dark, or buy their power and heat, while we make ours, unless it be that the gentleman believes that the heat and the light which are thrown off here in this Hall will aid in making the power plant smaller for us than it would be up there? Even on that I would not agree with the gentleman, because the scintillations of those scientific gentlemen up there create a great deal of heat and light. [Laughter.]

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, speaking for the moment to the merits of this provision, as long as the point of order has been reserved, I wish to say that I addressed a letter to the chairman of the building committee, Doctor Galloway, asking his reasons for recommending this provision, and he replied as follows, and I ask the attention of the Chair as well as the members of the committee to this, because I think it may have some bearing on the ruling of the Chair:

UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
NEW BUILDINGS,
Washington, D. C., February 11, 1908.

Hon. C. F. SCOTT,
Chairman Committee on Agriculture,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. SCOTT: The item of $25,000 included in the estimates of the Department of Agriculture under contingent expenses is desired for the installation of machinery for the generation of electricity for lighting and power purposes for the new buildings and also for the present buildings of the Department. It is desired to install this machinery in order that the Department may be independent of the local lighting company and to effect a saving. The principal reasons for desiring this plant are as follows:

(1) The service obtainable from the local lighting company has always been very unsatisfactory, the voltage being low and fluctuating to a considerable extent. A small 25-kilowatt capacity machine was installed in the present main building, and it is necessary to operate this machine to get satisfactory lighting.

(2) The rate obtainable from the lighting company is 6 cents per kilowatt hour, which, based on the estimated consumption for the Department's new buildings of 280,000 kilowatt hours annually, would represent a cost of $16,800. The local company has refused to give the Department less than a 6-cent rate under a year's contract.

(3) In view of the fact that the Department can use practically all of the exhaust steam from the generating machinery for heating the buildings and heating hot water for laboratory purposes and that a considerable operating force is necessary for operating compressors, pumps, motors, etc., the electric current can be generated at a very low cost, estimated at 2.07 cents per kilowatt hour, which at the above-mentioned consumption, would be in total amount $5,600.

(4) Referring to the two previous items, it is apparent that a saving of approximately $11,200 would be effected annually by installing this machinery, which would cost approximately $25,000.

The question as to whether the Department could generate current at a less cost than same can be secured from the local lighting company was taken up by a committee under the Secretary of the Treasury, and a copy of the Secretary's decision relative thereto is transmitted herewith.

The Department at present has a service connection from the Bureau of Engraving and Printing. This connection was installed with the understanding that the same would be used for a break-down connection for the Department of Agriculture or the Bureau of Engraving and Printing as the emergency might arise in the event that electric-generating machinery was installed in this Department.

The act approved February 9, 1903, for the erection of a building for the use and accommodation of the Department of Agriculture did not provide for the installation of the electric machinery above refererd to, but this machinery is necessary for the efficient and economical operation of the mechanical equipment of the building.

Very truly, yours,

B. T. GALLOWAY,
Chairman Building Committee.

That is to say, the cost of the machinery would be saved in two years. Now, I have also a letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, dated November 20, 1907, and addressed to the Secretary of Agriculture, in which he says:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, November 20, 1907.

The honorable the SECRETARY OF AGRICULTURE.

SIR: Referring to the provisions of section 9 of the act making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1908, and for other purposes, approved March 4, 1907, viz:

"No appropriation heretofore or hereafter made for the construction or equipment of any executive or municipal building in the District of Columbia shall be expended for the production of electricity for light or power, unless, in the judgment of the Secretary of the Treasury, such necessary electric current for light and power can not be obtained at a less cost," and to your letters dated March 29 and July 8, 1907, all relating to the application of the foregoing provisions, I have the honor to advise you that, after careful consideration of the matter, it is the judgment of the Secretary of the Treasury that the necessary electric current for lighting and power purposes for the buildings under your control can not be purchased at present at a price less than that involved in the production of light and power in the plants in the buildings indicated.

Respectfully,

J. B. REYNOLDS,
Acting Secretary.

Now, Mr. Chairman, on the point of order, it seems to me that, in the light of the act which is quoted in the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury, the law fixing a given sum for the completion of the agricultural building obviously did not include the installation of power-plant machinery, and therefore does not stand as a bar to this appropriation.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask what is the point of order the gentleman is now discussing?

Mr. SCOTT. The gentleman from Illinois raised a point of order.

Mr. PERKINS. Exactly. What was his point of order?

Mr. SCOTT. I think the point of order was that this provision is not authorized by law.

Mr. PERKINS. To what was it made?

Mr. TAWNEY. To the authorization of a power plant.

Mr. SCOTT. The gentleman from Illinois can state his point of order.

Mr. MADDEN. My point of order was——

Mr. PERKINS. To what words did you make the point of order?

Mr. MADDEN. To the words beginning in line 2, page 39, down to line 5, page 39, as follows:

And also including not to exceed $25,000 for the installation of power-plant machinery to furnish power and light for the new buildings of the Department in the city of Washington.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Chairman, I had intended to make a point of order under the reservation granted by the Chair on the same words, but for a different reason from what has been discussed, and before the Chair disposes of the point of order I would like to be heard.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman from New York now.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Chairman, I make the point that this is not authorized by law, on the ground that the buildings are not authorized by law. As I understand the law—and I do not think the gentleman in charge of the bill will question my statement—Congress has authorized the construction of a building for the Department of Agriculture and there is no other authority. The bill here says for the construction of a power plant that is to be carried to the new buildings of the Department of Agriculture. If the law is, as I am informed, that one building has been authorized——

Mr. TAWNEY. If the gentleman from New York will permit, the authorization for that building also expressly provides that the building when completed shall be of sufficient size to accommodate the needs of the Agricultural Department, fixes the limit within which the building shall be constructed, expressly provides for the power plant to furnish to this building the heat and power and light necessary to its occupancy, and all was included within the limit of cost. This proposition does not relate to that building at all nor to any building heretofore authorized by Congress.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman point out the language he refers to?

Mr. TAWNEY. The gentleman from New York has the language which authorizes the construction of the building complete in all its details.

The CHAIRMAN. But it does not refer to a power plant.

Mr. TAWNEY. It does provide for a power plant.

Mr. MANN. It provides for heating.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to get at the position of the gentleman from Minnesota in reference to the original statute. The Chair was unable to find the language referred to by the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I reserved the point of order, but I now make the point of order.

Mr. TAWNEY. I will read the language of the statute:

That the Secretary of Agriculture be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to cause a suitable and commodious fireproof building, for the use and accommodation of the Department of Agriculture, including all of its bureaus and offices now occupying rented quarters in the District of Columbia, to be erected on such portion of the grounds of the Department of Agriculture belonging to the United States as he may deem expedient, immediately in the vicinity of the present building, said building to be constructed in accordance with plans to be procured, based on accurate estimates, providing for the erection of said building, complete in all its details, as herein described, and within a total cost of not exceeding the sum herein stipulated, and he is hereby authorized, after procuring such plans, and after due advertisement for proposals, to enter into contracts within the limit of cost hereby fixed and subject to appropriations made by Congress, for the erection of said building complete, including heating and ventilating apparatus, elevators, and approaches, and the removal of the present building or buildings of the Department of Agriculture on said grounds.

Now, as a matter of fact, the building authorized has not been constructed and is not in existence to-day. The buildings which it is proposed in this act to provide for——

The CHAIRMAN. The pending question is on the point of order made by the gentleman from Illinois, that this power plant was provided for in the statute which the gentleman from Minnesota has just read.

Mr. TAWNEY. In the first place, the power plant for heating and ventilation must be constructed and provided for in this building.

The CHAIRMAN. This is a power plant.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman think that when we authorized the Office Building at a total cost of $3,100,000 for the completion of the building that that included the power plant?

Mr. TAWNEY. It does not.

Mr. MANN. How does the gentleman make the distinction?

Mr. TAWNEY. I say that if the authorization for the construction of the Office Building not only provided that it should be completed within that limit of cost, but also provided that the equipment, namely, the elevators and ventilation and heating of the building, etc., should be included in the limit of cost it would necessarily imply the authorization of a power plant, because you do not build the buildings for manufacturing purposes, you do not need power for any other purpose than to operate the elevators; you do not need heat except for furnishing the heat for the accommodation of the inmates of the building.

While this term "power plant" is used in all of the public buildings authorized, now building and occupied, as a matter of fact the proper designation is a heating plant.

Mr. MANN. What is the distinction between the act for the Office Building and the act for the Agricultural building?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is prepared to rule.

Mr. PERKINS. If the Chair will allow me one moment——

The CHAIRMAN. This is not on the point of order of the gentleman from New York [Mr. PERKINS].

Mr. PERKINS. Of course I only want to state that the point of order, though on a different ground, is against the same words.

The CHAIRMAN. Certainly; and the Chair will hear the gentleman from New York.

Mr. TAWNEY. If the Chair will indulge me for a moment, I want to say in reply to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. SCOTT], who addressed himself to the merits of this proposition——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] has made a point of order.

Mr. TAWNEY. I understood that the gentleman from Illinois had reserved it, and that it was on that reservation that the gentleman from Kansas was discussing the merits of the proposition.

The CHAIRMAN. That was the first proposition. The gentleman from Illinois has made the point of order and the Chair is prepared to rule. The statute referred to by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] provided for the erection of a building complete in all details, including heating and ventilating apparatus, elevators, and approaches. Now, it seems to the Chair that if it was intended to provide in this carefully drawn statute for the installation of a power plant it would also have been included, as well as the heating and ventilating apparatus and the elevators.

Mr. MADDEN. Would the Chair allow me to say a word there?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will be glad to hear from the gentleman.

Mr. MADDEN. It must be well understood, Mr. Chairman, that an elevator can not be operated without a power plant. It would be impossible to operate an elevator without a power plant.

The CHAIRMAN. No, indeed.

Mr. MANN. You can not operate an elevator without power, but you can operate it without a power plant.

Mr. MADDEN. You can not operate an elevator without a power plant; and if that be so, a provision in the bill for an elevator must also be construed as including a power plant. It can not be said that an elevator can operate itself. It must be assumed that to operate the elevator power must be applied. Now the question is, Where is this power applied from? Does the building have the power to operate the elevator in the building, or is this power supplied from some other source? If it is supplied from some other source, there must be some provision in this bill to pay for the power so supplied.

If there is no appropriation in this bill to pay for that power, then the fair conclusion must be that the power is within the building and is included within the limit of cost, and if it is included in the limit of cost, the appropriaton is in excess of the limit of cost, and is therefore subject to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair can not take that view.

Mr. MADDEN. I might add, in addition to what I have already said, that this electric-light plant is not authorized by any existing law, regardless of whether or not it is included in the limit of cost in the building in which it is proposed to be erected.

Mr. SCOTT. It is a continuing work.

Mr. MADDEN. If this is a continuing work, they can continue to put anything in the building that they choose, whether necessary or not, to complete the work. An electric-light plant is not a part of the building in the sense that the gentleman says it is necessary to complete the work, but it is a part of the power plant which is provided in the original law, without which it could not be operated at all.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, if it was the intention of Congress that the original limit of cost fixed upon the Agricultural building should include the cost of installing electric-light machinery, what point was there in passing a general law to bar from all public buildings in the District any plant for the generation of electric currents unless the Secretary of the Treasury first reported that the current could be more cheaply furnished in that way?

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Chairman, I was glad to hear the chairman state that this statute was carefully drawn, and the point which I wish to make raises the question as to whether a carefully drawn law shall be enforced or shall be disregarded. The statute, as the chairman will remember, provides for the construction of a building for the use of the Agricultural Department. It is apparent, not that one building has been erected, but that two buildings have been erected. The wording of the provision now under consideration is this: "To furnish power and light for new buildings," using the plural. Then, Mr. Chairman, we have precisely this question: Congress has authorized the construction of a new building—one building—and application is made for the construction of a power plant in two buildings, because two at least there must be. The section itself uses the plural. It is for the chairman to say whether, when one building has been authorized by law, an appropriation can be made for two buildings, one of which necessarily lacks authorization of law.

If the committee had reported this provision for one building modified or changed, we might have a different question; but not only are there two buildings, as every member of this committee knows, standing there instead of the one building authorized by law, but the wording of the provision before the committee now is "for a power plant for buildings"—in the plural. Can the chairman of the committee say that where one building stands legally and one building without authorization of Congress that Congress can make an appropriation for two buildings, one authorized by law and one unauthorized by law? Nobody has referred to any statute, nor can any statute be referred to, which authorizes the construction of two new buildings for the Department of Agriculture, and hence we are now asked to make an appropriation for a power plant, not for one new building authorized, but for two new buildings which stand there, one authorized and one unauthorized.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask the gentleman—he refers to the fact that the original authorization was for a building, and the present power plant is for "new buildings," in the plural. I think the language in the bill putting "new buildings" in the plural may be, perhaps, a little unfortunate, and that it would have been better to have said, "for the new hyphenated building," because that is what is over there. It is one building with a hyphen between the two parts of it.

Mr. PERKINS. It is one building with no connection.

Mr. MANN. It has a hyphen connection. Any hyphenated word is not one word merely, but would be two words coupled by a hyphen. Now, if the hyphen were taken out over there between those two buildings there would be only the one building, and hence we might properly call it the "one hyphenated building."

Mr. TAWNEY. Unauthorized, however, by Congress.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I desire to call the attention of the Chair to this: If this power-plant building be not authorized by the act authorizing the new Agricultural building and included within the limit of cost there fixed, then it is not authorized in any act, and there is no authority of law for the construction of the building.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman make that point of order?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I do.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains that point of order.

Mr. SCOTT. May I inquire what is the point or order?

Mr. FITZGERALD. The point is that there does not seem to be any authority for the installation of this building unless it is included in the original statute, and if it is in the orginal it can not be adopted here because it increases the expense.

Mr. SCOTT. What is the effect of the Chair's ruling, to strike out from the bill the language on page 39, beginning with line 2, with the word "and" on to the close of the paragraph?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Going down to the word "Washington," line 5.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I move that the footing be corrected to correspond with the change that has been made in the bill by the point of order.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Agricultural experiment stations: To carry into effect the provisions of an act approved March 2, 1887, entitled "An act to establish agricultural experiment stations in connection with the colleges established in the several States under the provisions of an act approved July 2, 1862, and of the acts supplementary thereto," and to enforce the execution thereof, $843,000, $30,000 of which sum shall be payable upon the order of the Secretary of Agriculture, to enable him to carry out the provisions of section 3 of said act of March 2, 1887, and the Secretary of Agriculture shall prescribe the form of the annual financial statement required by section 3 of said act of March 2, 1887; shall ascertain whether the expenditures under the appropriation hereby made are in accordance with the provisions of said act, and shall make report thereon to Congress, and to carry out the provisions of sections 2, 4, and 5 of an act approved March 16, 1906, entitled "An act to provide for an increased annual appropriation for agricultural experiment stations and regulating the expenditure thereof," and the Secretary of Agriculture is hereby authorized to rent offices and to employ such assistants, clerks, and other persons as he may deem necessary in the city of Washington and elsewhere and to incur such other expenses for office fixtures and supplies, stationery, official traveling expenses, freight and express charges, illustration of the Experiment Station Record, bulletins, and reports, as he may find essential in carrying out the objects of the above acts; and the sums apportioned to the several States shall be paid quarterly in advance. And the Secretary of Agriculture hereafter may furnish to such institutions or individuals as may care to buy them copies of the card index of agricultural literature prepared by the Office of Experiment Stations and charge for the same a price covering the additional expense involved in the preparation of these copies, the money received from such sales to be deposited in the Treasury of the United States as miscellaneous receipts; and the Secretary of Agriculture is hereby authorized to expend $83,000 of said sum to establish and maintain agricultural experiment stations in Alaska, Hawaii, Porto Rico, and the island of Guam, including the erection of buildings, the printing (in Hawaii and Porto Rico), illustration, and distribution of reports and bulletins: Provided, That not more than $5,000 shall be expended at Guam and not more than $26,000 shall be expended for the maintenance of stations in Alaska, Hawaii, and Porto Rico; and the Secretary of Agriculture is authorized to sell such products as are obtained on the land belonging to the agricultural experiment stations in Alaska, Hawaii, Porto Rico, and the island of Guam, and to apply the money received from the sale of such products to the maintenance of said stations, and this fund shall be available until used; in all, $843,000: Provided, That $10,000 of this sum shall be used by the Secretary of Agriculture to investigate and report upon the organization and progress of farmers' institutes and agricultural schools in the several States and Territories, and upon similar organizations in foreign countries, with special suggestions of plans and methods for making such organizations more effective for the dissemination of the results of the work of the Department of Agriculture and the agricultural experiment stations, and of improved methods of agricultural practice.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order, on page 41, against the words "and the island of Guam," in line 15. Also against the words "Provided, That not more than $5,000 shall be expended at Guam," in lines 18 and 19, and the words "and the island of Guam," line 24.

Mr. PERKINS. I also reserve the point of order against the proviso on page 42.

Mr. SCOTT. Speaking first, Mr. Chairman, to the point of order reserved by the gentleman from Illinois, I concede, of course, that if insisted upon it must be sustained. The provision was inserted because, in the judgment of your committee, the people of the island of Guam are entitled to as much consideration in proportion to their numbers as the people of Porto Rico, Hawaii, and the Philippine Islands. Ever since those possessions came within the jurisdiction of the United States a sum of money has been appropriated and carried in this bill establishing and maintaining experiment stations there.

Mr. PERKINS. Will the gentleman yield? How many people are there in the island of Guam?

Mr. SCOTT. I am coming to that in a moment. Nothing has been done in that direction, however, in the island of Guam, and yet there are a great many reasons why similar work should be done there. The population of the island now is about 9,000 people. The island is said to be extremely fertile and the people intelligent, industrious, and peaceful. Prior to the American occupation the chief food supply of the island was drawn from the cocoanut groves. By the carelessness of our officials, however, some diseased cocoanut trees were introduced into the island, and the disease has spread from them so rapidly as to threaten the complete extinction of the native groves. Having this resource taken away from them, the people are at great loss to know where to turn for a livelihood. Undoubtedly the soil of the island, situated as it is within the Tropics, is susceptible of producing very large food supplies, but the people are untrained and untaught. They have hardly any agricultural implements. I have been told by one of the Representatives from the Philippines on this floor [Mr. OCAMPO] that practically the only implement they have is the hoe, which they have fashioned from the gun barrels left over by the Spaniards. As I may have said in my opening statement, they have not exactly beaten their spears into pruning hooks and their swords into plowshares, but they have come as near to it as they could in view of the raw material at hand. It seems to me, therefore, that it is not extravagant for us to expend $5,000 in an effort to help those people overcome the difficulties which they suffer now largely on our account.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SCOTT. I will yield for a question.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Does the gentleman know the area of the island of Guam.

Mr. SCOTT. Two hundred and ten square miles.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. How much of that is subject to cultivation?

Mr. SCOTT. A very large part of it is subject to cultivation.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. The population is 9,000?

Mr. SCOTT. The population is 9,000.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Practically all in one community, is it not?

Mr. SCOTT. They are scattered along the fringe of the island and in the valleys of the interior. The greater part of the population, of course, lives in or near the capital.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Are the natural products of a tropical character?

Mr. SCOTT. Almost entirely so.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. We acquired that island mainly for a naval station, did we not?

Mr. SCOTT. It came to us along with the treaty of Paris, with the other possessions we received from Spain.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. We have an organization of marines there?

Mr. SCOTT. The island has been for the most part, as the gentleman doubtless very well knows, under the administration of the Navy Department.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. It is now, altogether, is it not?

Mr. SCOTT. I think so. I think it still is. I should like to add this to what I have already said. We have spent a lot of money in Porto Rico, we have spent a good deal of money in Hawaii, and a great deal in the Philippines to promote the moral, educational, and material welfare of the people of those islands. But we have spent practically nothing to help the people of Guam. They have been peaceable and patient, and I sometimes fear that for this very reason we have neglected them. I do not think we ought to neglect them any longer.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Of the 9,000 population in Guam, how many are white?

Mr. SCOTT. The great body of the population is of Malay origin, and there are not any white people there except those connected with the administration of the United States, or, perhaps, a few Spanish merchants.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Then, the gentleman proposes to appropriate 50 cents apiece for the population on the island there to introduce our methods of agriculture among a people that have been getting along pretty well without us?

Mr. SCOTT. They have not been getting along very well. They are, indeed, in cruel straits, and very much need the help which can be carried to them by even so small a sum as $5,000. With that amount the Department estimates they can put one man there, and on account of the small area of the island he can carry on the work of agricultural education among the people with very excellent results.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Are their straits any greater now than when we found them?

Mr. SCOTT. It is reported, I am sorry to say, that such is the case.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. What are their straits about as to anything we have done?

Mr. SCOTT. There is a disease that is sweeping through their cocoanut trees, from which they derive the greater part of their income and food supply, and it was introduced by our carelessness.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Which it will take $5,000 to discover a cure for?

Mr. SCOTT. No; which it might take $5,000 to teach the people how to make a living in spite of.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. Does the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] insist on his point of order?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order as to that part of the paragraph on page 41 to which a point of order was raised by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN].

The gentleman from New York makes the point of order to the language on page 42——

Mr. PERKINS. Beginning with the word "provided," in line 3, and going to the close of the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman state his point of order?

Mr. PERKINS. It is new legislation.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, on the point of order made by the gentleman from New York, I wish to say that the language referred to has been carried in this bill for a great many years, and I think it fully authorized by the general act providing for the organization of the Department. Undoubtedly one of the best ways to disseminate agricultural information is through the farmers' institutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman permit the Chair to ask a question?

Mr. SCOTT. With pleasure.

The CHAIRMAN. Does not this proviso "direct" this to be done? Does the original statute "direct?"

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, in order to avoid the point of order which the Chair undoubtedly has in his mind, I will move to amend the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will sustain the point of order.

Mr. SCOTT. Then I will offer the following amendment:

Following the colon in line 3 insert:
"Provided, That not to exceed $10,000 may be used by the Secretary of Agriculture to investigate and report upon the organization and progress of farmers' institutes and agricultural schools in the several States and Territories, and upon similar organizations in foreign countries, with special suggestions of plans and methods for making such organizations more effective for the dissemination of the results of the work of the Department of Agriculture and the agricultural experiment stations, and of improved methods of agricultural practice."

On page 42, after the colon in line 3, insert:
"Provided, That not to exceed $10,000 may be used by the Secretary of Agriculture to investigate and report upon the organization and progress of farmers' institutes and agricultural schools in the several States and Territories, and upon similar organizations in foreign countries, with special suggestions of plans and methods for making such organizations more effective for the dissemination of the results of the work of the Department of Agriculture and the agricultural experiment stations, and of improved methods of agricultural practice."

Mr. MANN. I reserve the point of order upon that amendment.

Mr. PERKINS. I reserve the same point of order. By this amendment of the provision the Secretary of Agriculture is authorized to investigate and report upon the organizations and products of agricultural societies of this and other countries. The question is, Mr. Chairman, whether the authority to improve agriculture includes authority to investigate the proceedings of agricultural societies in other lands. An investigation into the methods and for the improvement of agriculture in States and other lands it may be he can make, but an investigation into their proceedings is not an investigation in the study of agriculture. It is investigation of the conduct of institutions and other persons interested in agriculture, for such purposes as the Secretary may desire; and therefore, it seems to me, that the change in the provision made by the gentleman in charge of the bill does not avoid the essential point, that the money may be spent by the Secretary of Agriculture in a matter and in an investigation that is outside the original authority granted to the Secretary.

Mr. LOWDEN. Mr. Chairman, I wish to address myself to this proposition. I want to make an appeal to my friends over there to withdraw any points of order. I have the honor in the county in which I live to be an official of the Farmers' Institute. I have been for a number of years, and I think I know something about the efficiency of farmers' institutes. This very modest appropriation would enable the Government to relate these different farmers' institutes one to another, to enable each of them to avail itself of the progress made by every other such institute. With reference to the suggestions made by my friend from New York about foreign investigations, I wish to state, on the merits of the proposition, that foreign governments have not had such acute attacks of economy when agriculture has appealed to those countries as has been the case in the United States. [Applause.]

I want to say that in almost every country of Europe very decided progress has been made. In Germany it appears, because of their more liberal and enlightened policy, they have passed us by in many of the productions which are common to the two countries. I have no doubt that this very modest sum that is asked for by the Department can be used most advantageously in studying the conditions in the countries of Europe, as well as in the farmers' institutes in this country. The fact is that there is not a single dollar mentioned in this bill which is more nearly in harmony and in sympathy with the original Morrill Act than this appropriation, and that act, as is admitted by all in this House, has been one of the most beneficent measures ever passed by Congress.

The whole purpose of the Morrill Act was education. Long before it had been seen that a republic to endure must be composed of an enlightened citizenship. The public school, therefore, by Government aid became an institution of the land. Morrill saw that agriculture was our chief industry. To his clear vision it was plain that commercial supremacy depended in its last analysis upon the products of the soil. To the general education which qualifies the citizen for his high duties there must be added technical education in our basic industry if we would attain the place among nations to which our great agricultural resources entitle us.

Germany was one of the first nations to recognize that agricultural and industrial triumphs must in the end rest upon scientific knowledge. A generation ago her spectacled professors were ridiculed all around the world. Americans particularly said that the Germans were impracticable dreamers whom we need never fear in the markets of the world. During the few years that since have intervened, as an inevitable result of the genius of those so-called "dreamers," Germany has made more agricultural and industrial progress than any other of the nations of Europe. She knew that science might sometimes speak obscurely, but that they who should confess faith in her ultimate triumph would one day reach the goal.

I am aware that many Members of this body doubt the practicability of the work which the Department does. I confess that but a few years ago the book farmer was an object of derision to the average farmer, but, under the stimulus of these educational instrumentalities, that time has passed. In every township in the section of the country where I live you can tell almost to a certainty, by the superior crops, by the superior methods, by the general air of prosperity, those farmers who read and understand and practice the lessons which the agricultural colleges, the experiment stations, and the Department of Agriculture teach.

Our resources in agriculture surpass the world. The problem now is to conserve those resources. Our very danger lay in what seemed, even a score of years ago, the inexhaustible richness of our fields. But under the leadership of our agricultural colleges, our experiment stations, our farmers' institutes, and our great Department of Agriculture we have finally learned that there can be no permanent agriculture without a scientific agriculture.

We now know that you can not everlastingly subtract from the soil, returning nothing to it, even upon our richest lands, without ultimate impoverishment. I undertake to say that if the methods which obtained a generation ago in the Mississippi Valley—richer agriculturally than any like area anywhere in the world—had continued for a hundred years, that valley would have become as unproductive as those sections of the East where farms are now only the toy of the well-to-do.

Years hence, when the history of this marvelous period is written, James Wilson, Secretary of Agriculture, will hold a very high place among the leaders whose constructive work has made for American commercial triumphs at home and abroad. That old Scotchman is the father of the new agriculture. And without the new agriculture America would soon be entering on her decline.

One result of the new agriculture is political and of far-reaching importance. Much as we admire our great cities, we must all confess that the security of the Republic in the future abides largely in our rural populations. In every crisis, whether of war or peace, we turn confidently for safety to the sober, deliberate judgment of those who dwell apart from the great metropolises.

Many thoughtful people have noted with regret the trend from the country toward the larger centers of population. The new agriculture is doing more to attach the farmers' sons to the soil than all other causes combined. With every advance of science in its relation to agriculture the drudgery of the farm diminishes. There has already begun to be substituted for it a noble profession in which the soils, the crops, and the improved breeds of domestic animals become the servants of the farmer's brain.

Now let us act just as if some other than the agricultural bill were before this House, and not insist upon points of order on meritorious propositions of this kind. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is prepared to rule, but if the gentleman from Illinois desires to be heard, he will hear him.

Mr. MANN. I believe this amendment was prepared after some discussion before. I do not know what the opinion of the Chair may be. The amendment now provides practically, as I understand it, that the Secretary of Agriculture may spend not to exceed $10,000 to investigate and report upon the organization and progress of farmers' institutes, etc. In the form as now presented it is not a limitation but an authorization. The change of the word "shall" to "may" makes it more strongly an authorization than before, because the use of the word "shall" was intended to be directly a limitation on the amount, while the use of the word "may" relates to the authorization. The Secretary of Agriculture, as I read the statute and the meaning of the organic act, does not now have the authority to investigate and report upon the organization and progress of farmers' institutes and agricultural schools in the United States, in foreign countries, etc. In the amendment now offered the Secretary of Agriculture is authorized to expend $10,000 in making these investigations, and the amendment as presented is not a limitation upon an appropriation made, not a limitation upon the sum that may be expended, but an authorization to expend that sum of money, and hence it seems to me it is subject to the point of order.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Chairman, I should like to say a word in reply to the suggestions made by my friend from Illinois. I entirely sympathize with him in his views upon agriculture, of which he is a most shining example; but what is this provision and wherein is it a benefit to the cause of agriculture? I put it to my friend from Illinois himself. It says the Secretary may expend not to exceed $10,000 in investigating the organization and progress of farmers' institutes. Suppose he went to the institute so wisely presided over by my friend from Illinois [Mr. LOWDEN]. What could he do? He would report upon its organization, which I have no doubt is beyond all praise, and he would report upon its progress, which, under the charge of my friend from Illinois, I am sure is above all criticism; but, after all, that information, however interesting, is not the pursuit of agriculture. It is investigating these various societies, well managed, well administered, and reporting what progress they have made and are making. It would be most interesting and instructive certainly in the case of my friend from Illinois, but, however justly deserved would be the praise he would receive, after all I can not see that it would be furthering the cause of agriculture.

Mr. LOWDEN. Mr. Chairman, I wish to correct the gentleman from New York. I did not say that I was president of the Ogle County Farmers' Institute, but only that I was an official of that body. The higher honor belongs to another.

In answer to the gentleman's question, I can see one beneficent result which would follow immediately. The Department of Agriculture would be authorized to go out into Ogle County, Ill., and other parts of the West, and find what we are doing there, and inform the gentleman from New York what the West is accomplishing. [Applause.] And the abandoned farms which we are told are multiplying in number very rapidly in the Empire State would soon be occupied again, and possibly agriculture would come back to that great Commonwealth. [Applause and laughter.]

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I have myself had both the honor and the pleasure of visiting one of the finest farms in the United States and in the world, presided over and operated by my distinguished colleague from Illinois [Mr. LOWDEN], and if we could appropriate $10,000 or $100,000 and take the citizens of the Empire State to the farm of the gentleman from Illinois, I would be in favor of the appropriation, because it would be worth while. He cultivates a farm in a manner that ought to be the admiration and envy of every farmer in the land, and the pride of every citizen of our State, and of everyone interested in agriculture. If it were to be confined to that, no one would object, but unfortunately that is not the proposition before the committee.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I beg to be indulged in another word on the point of order. It may be that owing to lack of skill and experience on the part of the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture he has failed in drafting, hastily and extemporaneously, an amendment to this paragraph, to use exactly the words that would carry it from under the point of order. But if that be the case a ruling sustaining the point of order would be purely technical, and I most respectfully suggest to the Chair that in a matter of this kind he may well look to the merits of the question; and in that view I wish to cite again the language of the organic act, which expressly authorizes the Secretary of Agriculture to acquire and diffuse among the people of the United States useful information on subjects connected with agriculture.

Now, Mr. Chairman, those of us who know anything about the Department of Agriculture realize that if there is one point in which it is weak it is in getting out to the people in a practicable and usable form the vast store of information accumulated by its scientists. Therefore it is of great importance that the methods of diffusing agricultural information should be studied, and that is the purpose, I will say to my friend from New York, in authorizing the Secretary to study agricultural societies in other lands—to find out what methods they are using to diffuse agricultural information among their people. Undoubtedly, in view of the great progress that has been made in other countries, they can teach us something in that particular. If they can, we ought to be permitted to learn, and there is no way in which we can learn except through the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SCOTT. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. If under the organic law the Secretary of Agriculture has this authority, what is the purpose of the gentleman in offering an amendment to confirm the authority upon the Secretary of Agriculture?

Mr. SCOTT. This language has been carried in the bill a great many years to meet the rulings of the Comptroller, who holds that there must be a specific appropriation and that you can not depend on the general statutes for authority to do everything, even when it is contained in the statutes.

Mr. MANN. The holding of the Comptroller as to the law is binding.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair holds that it is not in order in this bill either to direct or authorize the Secretary of Agriculture to make such investigation, and the Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I would like to offer another amendment. I understand that the language beginning at the word "provided," in line 3, has been stricken out.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will make the necessary changes in the total.

There was no objection.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

Page 42, line 3, insert a new paragraph, to read as follows:

"To enable the Secretary of Agriculture to investigate and report upon the organization and progress of farmers' institutes and agricultural schools in the several States and Territories, and upon similar organizations in foreign countries, with special suggestions of plans and methods for making such organizations more effective for the dissemination of the results of the work of the Department of Agriculture and the agricultural experiment stations, and of improved methods of agricultural practice, $10,000."

Mr. PERKINS. To that, Mr. Chairman, I make the same point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will overrule the point of order.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk, proceeding with the reading of the bill, read as follows:

Nutrition investigations: For setting up all apparatus now the property of the Government and used in the nutrition investigations, and for preparing for publication results already obtained, $3,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I want to ask the chairman how many years have these investigations been going on?

Mr. SCOTT. Eighteen years, I should say.

Mr. PERKINS. Eighteen long years?

Mr. SCOTT. Eighteen long years.

Mr. PERKINS. Have they not come to an end yet?

Mr. SCOTT. They were brought to a violent end last year by act of Congress. If the gentleman will permit me, I will recall it to his attention. Last year there was inserted in the agricultural appropriation bill a paragraph providing $5,000 to pack and transport the apparatus which had been used in the State of Connecticut in carrying forward nutrition investigations and bring that apparatus to the city of Washington. Only $2,000 of the $5,000 authorized for the purpose was used, and the Secretary recommended this year that the remainder of that sum be appropriated for setting up this apparatus and preparing for publication certain results which had been already obtained, but not yet published.

I wish to state that the Committee on Agriculture was waited upon by a great many people and the chairman of that committee received a great many letters, from teachers particularly, strongly appealing for a large appropriation for the continuation of these nutrition investigations. The teachers argued that there was no other source of information open to them which would give them the facts to lay before their pupils in order to carry forward the hygienic and nutrition work which the curriculum of the public schools called for.

Perhaps I gave a wrong impression a few moments ago when I said that the Secretary recommended the appropriation of the $3,000 unused by the Bureau. The Secretary recommended that $25,000 be appropriated to continue the nutrition investigations, but in view of the action of Congress last year your committee did not feel warranted in resuming these investigations; but it did feel that the apparatus which is now here and which is of considerable value, worth perhaps $20,000 or $25,000, should not be allowed to go to ruin by being packed away in boxes in a basement somewhere, but should be set up and properly cared for.

We thought also that the results which had already been obtained might well be prepared for publication. It was not until after the bill had been framed by the committee that the parties to whom I have alluded came to the chairman of the committee asking for an increase in this appropriation for the resumption of the work. I am very much disposed to think that if the whole committee could have heard what the chairman heard in this matter an appropriation would have been inserted in the bill to continue the work, but it was not thought of sufficient importance to reopen the bill.

Mr. PERKINS. Does not the gentleman think that in eighteen long years this investigation should have been brought to an end?

Mr. SCOTT. Oh, it is of such a character that in the very nature of things it will probably never end. There are constantly new problems coming up, there are new foods to be tested or there are foods under different conditions to be tested, and it is of a character that may well continue indefinitely. Let me suggest to the gentleman that very important results have been reached year by year——

Mr. PERKINS. Will the gentleman tell us any changes that he has made in his own system of nutrition as a result of these eighteen years of experience?

Mr. SCOTT. The gentleman has been blessed with such a high degree of health throughout all the days of the years of his pilgrimage upon this earth that he has never had occasion to avail himself of the information developed by this investigation.

Mr. PERKINS. Does the gentleman know of any changes that have been made in diet as a result of this investigation?

Mr. SCOTT. Oh, yes; these investigations have been of great value to the boards and superintendents and others in charge of charitable and penal and eleemosynary institutions. They have gone to develop what would constitute a nutritive ration which could be purchased at low average cost. The chairman of the committee had information brought to him to show that many thousands of dollars had been saved in certain large institutions by reason of the fact that from the knowledge developed by these investigations they were able to supply their inmates with food which was just as nourishing as that which they had been using heretofore, but which did not cost as much; and in many other ways the investigations have been of great value.

Mr. DRISCOLL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I want to ask the gentleman if this is expended for the Bureau of Chemistry, under Doctor Wiley?

Mr. SCOTT. No; the work is carried on under the direction of the Office of Experiment Stations.

Mr. DRISCOLL. Doctor Wiley is the man that spends most of his time in investigating foods and poisons.

Mr. SCOTT. This happens not to be within his jurisdiction.

Mr. MANN. These investigations were carried on by Doctor Atwater in Connecticut, and they were most valuable in their results.

The Clerk read as follows:

Irrigation and drainage investigations: To enable the Secretary of Agriculture to investigate and report upon the laws of the States and Territories as affecting irrigation and the rights of appropriators, and of riparian proprietors and institutions relating to irrigation, and upon the use of irrigation waters, at home and abroad, with especial suggestions of the best methods for the utilization of irrigation waters in agriculture, and upon plans for the removal of seepage and surplus waters by drainage, and upon the use of different kinds of power and appliances for irrigation and drainage, and for the preparation, printing, and illustration of reports and bulletins on irrigation and drainage, including employment of labor in the city of Washington or elsewhere; and all necessary expenses, $150,000.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by adding after the word "dollars," on line 6, page 43, the following:

"Provided, That no part of this appropriation shall be expended in the making of any topographic surveys."

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, during the hearings before the Committee on Appropriations on the sundry civil appropriation bill, information was elicited that surveys were being made by this bureau of the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. SCOTT. May I inquire of the gentleman who gave that testimony?

Mr. MADDEN. The Director of the Geological Survey.

Mr. SCOTT. Does the gentleman think that he knows as much about it as the chief of this office?

Mr. MADDEN. Perhaps not. I do not know that he should. However, he gave the information, and inasmuch as the Geological Survey is always prepared to furnish topographic maps that may be required by the Department of Agriculture, I thought it was wise to limit the expenditure so that no part of the appropriation made for this particular work should be used for making topographic surveys.

Mr. SCOTT. Will the gentleman answer this question? Is it the judgment of the gentleman that if his amendment prevails the Office of Experiment Stations, under this heading of "Irrigation and drainage investigations," would not be allowed to make the survey which might be necessary to determine whether a swamp could be reclaimed or whether the lowlands of a river might be protected from floods?

Mr. MADDEN. I think it would not interfere with that. It is simply the question of making what is generally understood as "topographic surveys" that it refers to.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I received from the Secretary of Agriculture, and from the Chief of this Office, letters stating that they did not make topographic surveys, neither in this Office nor in any other bureau of the Department. They do make, under the provision carried in this paragraph, surveys which are intended to develop methods for reclaiming the swamp lands or preventing the overflow of lowlands along the river bottoms.

They are not, strictly speaking, topographic maps, yet they may have such an intimate relation to topographic maps that a strict construction of the amendment which the gentleman has offered, if it should prevail, would prevent the Office from making such surveys and maps. While I believe, therefore, that the amendment is wholly unnecessary I hope, in the interest of the legitimate work of this Bureau, it will not prevail.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I have no desire to embarrass the Bureau at all, nor have I any desire in anywise to ask for an amendment to the paragraph unnecessarily, but I believe that if the Department, through this Bureau, is making topographic surveys, as topographic surveys are generally understood, that it should not be permitted to expend this money for that purpose. However, if there is any danger whatever of interfering with the legitimate work of the Bureau I would be the last one to attempt to do so, and on the statement of the chairman of the committee having charge of the bill I would gladly withdraw the amendment lest it should have the effect of interfering with the legitimate work of the Bureau.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I do that for the purpose of making a statement. The question of drainage is one of very considerable interest and one that a great number of people in this country are taking a very active interest in now. There have been a number of bills introduced into this House and at the other end of this Capitol looking to the United States Government in some way taking hold of the subject of drainage. I do not know that the Federal Government will ever come to that, but if we are, it is very desirable first to ascertain with some degree of accuracy just the extent of the swamp and overflowed areas of the United States which are susceptible of proper drainage and which it is desirable to have drained.

There are few subjects that have been more frequently discussed in this House than our proper course in relation to our swamp and overflowed lands, and we are apparently no nearer a conclusion than ever. We began legislating on the subject way back in 1849, when the first of these laws was passed, to enable the State of Louisiana to construct levees and to drain and reclaim her swamp and overflowed lands. This was followed by similar statutes granting these lands to the other States. In recent years we have passed the reclamation act, under which the proceeds from the sale of the public lands of many of the States are converted into a fund from which the great irrigation projects are conducted. In this way thousands of acres of the arid West are being brought under cultivation and the wisdom of the legislation is now pretty generally recognized. Few propositions, however, have met with more bitter opposition in this House than did the reclamation act, and all the maledictions which are now invoked upon the suggestion to have Federal cooperation in the matter of drainage were then called down upon the irrigation project. The proposition then was to take water to the arid lands, and now it is to take water from the overflowed lands. There is not much public land now remaining in the States which are most interested in drainage, and the fund that could be created by their sale would not be a large one. If the Government should ever decide, however, to embark upon this line of cooperation, the ways and means to provide the necessary funds could be arranged as easily as the other details.

I do not know, nobody knows, just how many acres of these water-soaked soils there are in the United States. I have seen many statements which vary greatly both as to the extent and the value of these areas. Mr. Wright, of the Bureau of Irrigation and Drainage, in a most interesting and instructive bulletin estimates the area at 77,000,000 acres, and their value after reclamation at something more than four and one-half billion dollars. This is certainly a splendid domain and well worthy the ambition of a prince, and any proposition looking to its reclamation ought to receive our most careful consideration. We are lagging behind the other great countries, Mr. Chairman, in many matters that are of most vital concern to our people. We are doing less for our agricultural interests than any of our European neighbors. England is a very small country in territorial extent, and yet she has loaned her farmers $36,000,000 at 3 per cent, to be repaid in twenty-two annual installments, to enable them to conduct these drainage projects, and the results have been most happy. France, Germany, Holland, even Italy, have done much along the same lines. I appreciate the limitations which the Constitution has set upon our powers and I shall be the last to ask that these very proper bounds be overstepped, and what I say is intended as much in criticism of our State legislatures as of Congress. Be the fault where it may, the fact is we are neglecting the fundamentals of national greatness and prosperity.

A MEMBER. Have we that power?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Let me say again that I am criticising the failure to do the work, whether the laches be Federal or State. I can not now go into the question of power. I will say, though, that I believe the work the Department of Agriculture is now doing under the direction of Mr. Elliott, the very capable Chief of the Bureau of Irrigation and Drainage, is clearly a Federal function. But the point I am trying to impress upon the House now, Mr. Chairman, is that the reclamation of our water-soaked soils is of the highest importance to the industrial development of our country, and it is a matter that is surely to demand action on our part in the not very distant future. That being true, we ought to take time by the forelock and set about to get the information that will be needed when the day of action comes.

At a very largely attended convention held in Memphis, Tenn., last year in the interest of drainage, which was attended by citizens of a number of the States of the Mississippi Valley, this whole matter was discussed and a series of resolutions was adopted. The gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], who is unavoidably absent to-day, was a member of the resolutions committee of that convention, perhaps chairman. At any rate he drew the resolutions, I know, which were adopted by that convention. In pursuance of those resolutions and along the lines suggested by them, he introduced a bill in this House this session, and as he is not here and as I was a member of that convention and of the resolutions committee, I will now ask to withdraw the pro forma amendment and offer this bill as an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois and the pro forma amendment offered by the gentleman from Mississippi will be considered as withdrawn, and the gentleman from Mississippi offers the following amendment, which the Clerk will report.

After the word "dollars," in line 6, page 43, add:

"That the Secretary of Agriculture be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to make or cause to be made investigations and surveys of the swamp, wet, and overflowed lands and to determine and ascertain what areas of such lands are susceptible of reclamation by drainage, to devise plans of drainage of such lands, and to make maps and charts thereof.

"That the Secretary of Agriculture shall make a report of his acts and proceedings, together with the plans and systems of drainage so devised and the maps and charts so made, and shall cause the same to be printed and published in convenient form.

"That the sum of $200,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the United States Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to carry out the provisions of this act."

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I am obliged to make a point of order against the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas makes the point of order upon the amendment. Does the gentleman from Mississippi desire to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. No, Mr. Chairman; I express considerable regret, but no astonishment.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment changes permanent law, and the Chair sustains the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

OFFICE OF PUBLIC ROADS.

Salaries, Office of Public Roads: One Director, who shall be a scientist and have charge of all scientific and technical work, $2,750; one chief of records, $1,600; one editorial clerk, $1,200; two clerks, class 1; three clerks, at $1,000 each; two clerks, at $720 each; in all $12,390.

Mr. DRISCOLL. Mr. Chairman, I do not intend to oppose the appropriation carried in this bill to be expended in making inquiries in regard to systems of road management throughout the United States, and in giving expert advice on road building, maintenance, and administration, and making investigations in regard to the best methods of making roads and the best kind of road-making materials in the several States.

Every bureau and division in this Department, as in all other Departments, is constantly striving to magnify the importance of its own work and to increase its appropriation, and the Office of Public Roads is no exception. If it would continue to confine its functions to the study of road building and giving advice on that subject, it might be of some use, and, at all events, it would be harmless. But the danger is that this is a sort of entering wedge which will commit the National Government to the general policy of building ordinary country roads throughout our land. My attention is directed to this subject at this time because I have been receiving during the last few days petitions and memorials from granges and other agricultural societies, urging me to support a bill providing for the creation of a national highways commission and making an appropriation from the Federal Treasury for the purpose of aiding in the construction and improvement of highways. I received so many of those petitions from the district which I have the honor to represent, and which I always try to serve to the limit of my ability and judgment, that I proceeded to look up the bills introduced in the House on the general subject of constructing country roads by the National Government, or at its expense. I find that eighteen bills have been introduced by Members of the House for that purpose, all seeking to accomplish the same thing, some directly and some seeking to accomplish by indirection what they apparently believe can not be done directly within the limitations of the Constitution, or the doing of which would be contrary to sound public policy. Many of these bills are similar and bear evidence of a common authorship, and I will review and analyze them.

The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS], the leader of his party in this House, early in this session introduced a bill providing that the surplus in the National Treasury, after it is determined by the Secretary of the Treasury, and not exceeding $25,000,000 a year, be distributed on a per capita basis among the States, Territories, and the District of Columbia, for the sole purpose of improving post-roads in said States, Territories, and the District of Columbia.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Will my friend yield?

Mr. DRISCOLL. Not now.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I wanted to ask the gentleman a question or two.

Mr. DRISCOLL. Thereafter other gentlemen from the South introduced other bills providing for very large expenditures on the part of the National Government out of the surplus in the Treasury, and providing that it be divided pro rata according to the population of the several States, excepting that the population of cities of over 50,000 should not be counted. According to those bills, the whole population of their States would be counted in the distribution of the surplus, and a majority of the population of the State of New York would not be counted. Then the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] amended his bill, or introduced another one, providing that this $25,000,000 surplus should be expended pro rata among the several States, Territories, and the District of Columbia, except that the population of no city of more than 50,000 should be counted. There is no city in the State of Mississippi which contains 50,000 souls, according to the last Federal Census; so that his second bill would allow him to count all the people in his State and would exclude from the count a large majority of the people of New York State.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I ask that his time be extended five minutes. I like to hear him talk.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from New York [Mr. DRISCOLL] be extended for five minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, I feel compelled——

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] object when the gentleman is discussing the gentleman's [Mr. WILLIAMS's] own bill.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I did not know the gentleman was criticising or talking about me.

Mr. DRISCOLL. I was discussing the two bills introduced by the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I make an exception this time, since the gentleman is criticising me, and shall not object. The subject-matter, of course, is so good that he ought to proceed.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. He can not hurt you in five minutes.

Mr. DRISCOLL. I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GAINES].

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Does the gentleman think the Government has no power to build post-roads per se?

Mr. DRISCOLL. I know that the Constitution provides for the establishment of post-roads, but the framers of the Constitution never dreamed of rural free-delivery carriers at that time.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. They were not dreamers. They were wise enough, though, to put that elastic provision in the Constitution that gives the right to build rural free-delivery roads and bridges and gates.

Mr. DRISCOLL. Now, you have asked a question——

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I just wanted your opinion about the proposition of law.

Mr. DRISCOLL. Well, I have answered it. Of these eighteen bills one was introduced by a Northern Republican, the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. CURRIER], who now presides; one by a Southern Republican, the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BROWNLOW]; two by Northern Democrats, [Mr. SULZER of New York and Mr. Cox of Indiana], and all the rest by Southern Democrats. According to the provisions of all those bills, their States get a tremendous advantage in the distribution of the surplus to be taken from the Treasury and in the expenditure of moneys by the National Government in building roads in the several States and Territories.

In the second Williams bill and other bills all their people are counted in the distribution of the surplus to be taken from the Treasury, whereas a large majority, or nearly two-thirds, of the people of the State of New York are not counted; and it is manifest that New York suffers in that division or distribution, or in the expenditure of money for roads according to that method.

I want the people who are urging me to support this national highways commission to understand some of the provisions contained in those bills and some of the motives which they disclose. I believe there is back of these bills somewhere a propaganda or central bureau which is sending out this printed matter to be signed by individuals and agricultural societies in the several districts in the country, to be sent on to their Representatives in Congress.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Will the gentleman pardon me just a moment?

Mr. DRISCOLL. I yield.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I am satisfied that my friend from the Ninth District, my colleague [Mr. SIMS], can tell him a great deal about how they have experimented in the city of Jackson, Tenn., where the municipality issued bonds, and took one of our own men and experimented with the proposition, and finally built some of the finest roads down there you ever saw. The man who did that has been working now on the part of the Government.

Mr. DRISCOLL. Mr. Chairman, in my judgment, if the National Government has power under the Constitution to go out into the country and build ordinary highways, even for rural free-delivery carriers to drive over once a day, it has the right to go into a city and build an asphalt pavement for city carriers. They are both paternalism run mad.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to an interruption?

Mr. DRISCOLL. Yes, sir.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I was so unfortunate as not to hear the gentleman when he spoke about my bill. Do I understand the gentleman has the impression that my bill enables the Federal Government to go into a State and build a road or exercise any control or ownership over the road after it is built?

Mr. DRISCOLL. The gentleman's bill provides that the roads may be built by money received from the National Treasury.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The gentleman was never more mistaken in his life, if he thinks that my bill provides that the Federal Government shall either build the road or exercise any act of ownership or construction over it.

Mr. DRISCOLL. I say the gentleman's bill provides that the roads shall be built by money from the National Treasury——

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes.

Mr. DRISCOLL. Although the gentleman would prefer to have the money sent down to his State and expended by his own people. That would be another advantage, and by that means he probably is reconciled to the idea of paternalism which he is talking against day in and day out.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I hope the gentleman will insert in his remarks a copy of the bill, which is very short.

Mr. DRISCOLL. I will be delighted.

Mr. WILLIAMS. So that the readers of the RECORD may see I am merely proposing to do what Congress did away back before the war in the distribution of the surplus among the States for internal improvements.

Mr. DRISCOLL. I ask unanimous consent not only to extend my remarks by inserting that bill in the RECORD, but some other bills, and to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD as indicated. Is there objection?

Mr. PAYNE. I think I will have to object. I see the gentleman from Mississippi abstains from objecting because his bill is to be inserted.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is heard.

Mr. SCOTT. I move to close debate on the paragraph——

Mr. DRISCOLL. I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD, and I will insert the gentleman's two bills. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] entertains such a high opinion of his bill that he desires to have it printed in the RECORD, and I promised to insert both. The following is a copy of his first bill, which was introduced on the 2d of December, 1907, the first day of the present session:

A bill (H. R. 95) to distribute the surplus in the Treasury of the United States to the several States, Territories, and the District of Columbia, for the sole purpose of improving the roads therein.

Be it enacted, etc., That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury at the end of each fiscal year to take an account of all the funds in the Treasury of the United States and after deducting from said sum the amounts required by law to be kept in said Treasury the remainder, if any, shall be declared a surplus.

SEC. 2. That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to provide immediately for the distribution of said surplus, not exceeding $25,000,000 annually during the continuance of this law, on a per capita basis to the States, Territories, and the District of Columbia, to be computed from the last general census taken by the national authorities, and shall prorate the same accordingly, for the sole purpose of improving the postal roads in said States, Territories, and District of Columbia, under such rules and regulations as the States, Territories, and District of Columbia may provide; and said Secretary shall immediately notify the governors of said States and Territories and the Commissioners of the District of Columbia the amounts due each, and that the same will be paid over to such person or persons as may be duly authorized by said States, Territories, and the District of Columbia to receive and receipt for the same.

SEC. 3. That should any State, Territory, or District divert said funds for any purpose other than the improvement of the postal roads that they shall not be allowed to participate in any further distribution of said funds until said State shall show to the satisfaction of the Secretary of the Treasury that a like amount so diverted has been expended from the treasury of said State, Territory, or District so diverting the same in a judicious manner upon the postal roads of said State, Territory, or District diverting the same.

SEC. 4. That it shall be the duty of the governors of the several States and Territories and the Commissioners of the District of Columbia to make a full and complete report to the Secretary of the Treasury on the 15th day of November each year what legislation, rules, and regulations have been adopted for the expenditure of said funds upon the postal roads, the manner in which the same has been spent, and the results accomplished. And it shall be the duty of said Secretary to submit said reports to Congress on the first day of each regular session.

That the gentleman may get due credit for both, I insert here a copy of the second bill, which was introduced on the 3d of February, 1898:

A bill (H. R. 10071) to distribute the surplus in the Treasury of the United States to the several States, Territories, and the District of Columbia for the sole purpose of improving the roads therein.

Be it enacted, etc., That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury at the end of each fiscal year to take an account of all the funds in the Treasury of the United States and after deducting from said sum the amounts required by law to be kept in said Treasury the remainder, if any, shall be declared a surplus.

SEC. 2. That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to provide immediately for the distribution out of said surplus, not exceeding $25,000,000 annually during the continuance of this law, on a per capita basis to the States, Territories, and the District of Columbia, to be computed from the last general census taken by the national authorities (excluding, however, from the population of each State the population of all cities within said State of 50,000 souls or over), and shall prorate the same accordingly, for the sole purpose of improving the postal roads in said States, Territories, and District of Columbia, under such rules and regulations as the States, Territories, and District of Columbia may provide; and said Secretary shall immediately notify the governors of said States and Territories and the Commissioners of the District of Columbia of the amounts due each, and that the same will be paid over to such person or persons as may be duly authorized by said States, Territories, and the District of Columbia to receive and receipt for the same.

SEC. 3. That should any State, Territory, or District divert said funds for any purpose other than the improvement of the postal roads that they shall not be allowed to participate in any further distribution of said funds until said State shall show to the satisfaction of the Secretary of the Treasury that a like amount so diverted has been expended from the treasury of said State, Territory, or District so diverting the same in a judicious manner upon the postal roads of said State, Territory, or District diverting the same.

SEC. 4. That it shall be the duty of the governors of the several States and Territories and the Commissioners of the District of Columbia to make a full and complete report to the Secretary of the Treasury on the 15th day of November each year what legislation, rules, and regulations have been adopted for the expenditure of said funds upon the postal roads, the manner in which the same has been spent, and the results accomplished. And it shall be the duty of said Secretary to submit said reports to Congress on the first day of each regular session.

The second bill is just like the first, except that all cities of 50,000 souls or over are excluded from the count.

Both bills are very bad, for they propose to commit the Federal Government to the policy and business of ordinary road building; and they aim to accomplish by a subterfuge what the gentleman admits the National Government should not do in a straightforward manner. The first bill has the virtue of being fair to all the States and Territories, for they would get their proportionate shares of the twenty-five millions of dollars drawn from the National Treasury according to their respective populations. But according to his second bill his State would get credit for all of its population, for it has no city of 50,000 souls, negroes included, whereas the State of New York would be denied 58.76 per cent of its share by the exclusion from the count and representation of all cities of more than 50,000 inhabitants. I hardly know how the District of Columbia would fare under this proposition for it is practically all city. That is the gentleman's conception of statesmanship and a square deal.

However, some of the gentleman's Democratic colleagues surpass their distinguished leader in the plan of overreaching and getting more than their share of Federal assistance.

Another gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. BOWERS] introduced a bill on January 3, 1908, substantially like the two Williams bills above quoted, except that it excludes from the count all cities of more than 30,000 population, and would therefore deny to the State of New York 60.13 per cent of its share, while Mississippi would get its full proportion, it having no city of over 30,000.

The gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS] on January 6, 1908, introduced a bill much like the Williams bills in substance. It provides for the distribution of a surplus in the National Treasury not to exceed half a million of dollars to each State, Territory, and the District of Columbia in any fiscal year, and that such distribution shall be apportioned according to the last Federal census, and revised and apportioned immediately following each succeeding census; and excluding from the count all cities of more than 25,000 inhabitants. That would give Oklahoma credit for all of its population, and would deprive the State of New York of a still greater proportion of its share. Verily this young State promises not to be backward in dipping into the Treasury.

The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON], on December 2, 1907, introduced a bill providing for a raid on the Federal surplus, to be distributed on a per capita basis to the States, Territories, and the District of Columbia, but excluding from the count all cities of more than 30,000.

The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FLOOD] on December 7, 1907, introduced a bill for the distribution of $25,000,000 of Federal surplus annually, on a per capita basis, to the States, Territories, and the District of Columbia, and it does not deny any of the States credit for the populations of their large cities. I give him due credit for being fair in not trying to appropriate for his own State more than its proportionate share. Let me say in passing that there is no surplus in the Treasury, nor has there been since the civil war. There can be no surplus while the Government is in debt. There may be daily, monthly, or yearly balances on the credit side of the ledger, but no surplus.

The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. WILEY] on the 2d of December, 1907, introduced a bill which has the merit of originality, for it does not seem to plagiarize any of the others. This bill provides that the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States shall have engraved and printed $200,000,000 of Treasury notes, which shall be legal tender for the payment of all debts and shall be placed in a fund to be known as the "general county road fund system of the United States," and to be expended solely for that purpose. It further provides that—

It shall be the duty of the Secretary of War to take charge of and supervise the construction of the said general county-road system in the United States and in the improvement and betterment of public roads, * * * to inaugurate and supervise the work, and to expend the sum of $500,000 per month pro rata with the number of miles of public roads in each State of the United States.

This bill cuts out the Territories and the District of Columbia. Alabama is a large State in area, with many and long country roads. You will notice that city roads are not included; and where would New York come in under this distribution of $200,000,000?

The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS], explaining his bills, said:

I do not believe in the advisability or the wisdom or the policy of the Federal Government going into a State and building roads, to maintain them, and to exercise acts of sovereignty or control over them. I wish I could add that I do not believe that the Federal Government has the constitutional power to do so. I can not in good faith deny the constitutional power to construct and maintain post-roads. * * * But I do not believe in the wisdom of it nor the policy of it, and I believe the exercise of the power, even though constitutional, would carry Federal control and centralization further than it ought to go.

You will notice that in his statement of the National Government's power he refers to "post-roads;" but the gentleman from Alabama has no hesitation in setting the Secretary of War at work in the construction of a general county-road system at the expense of the Federal Treasury. These gentlemen are both experienced statesmen and profound constitutional lawyers, and I pit them against each other. They differ as to constitutionality, paternalism, and centralization, but they agree in their mutual desire to dip into the Federal Treasury to do what they ought to do themselves.

The gentleman from Florida [Mr. CLARK] on December 16, 1907, introduced a bill providing "That the Secretary of War shall have built and constructed in each and every State in the United States a good, hard-surfaced highway of the best and most durable material that may be found within the limits of the particular State, full 20 feet wide and 100 miles in length," and paid for out of the National Treasury. This gentleman begs leave to differ with his leader on the policy of the National Government going into the several States and building roads therein. He is willing to waive his inherited views against the invasion of State rights and against paternalism if he can only get 100 miles of road built at the national expense. Florida has three Representatives in Congress. Nevada has one and is not entitled to half that on its population. Yet these little States and others get as much road as the Empire State.

Mr. Chairman, we now come to a grist of bills of a different class, but aiming at the same result—the construction of ordinary country roads at the expense of the Federal Treasury, and giving to the States which the gentlemen introducing these bills represent much more than their legitimate share of the Federal assistance.

The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. PATTERSON], on the 24th of January, 1908, introduced a bill providing for the establishment in the Department of Agriculture of a bureau to be known as the Bureau of Public Highways. All highways are supposed to be public and open to all passengers. But we will let that pass. All greedy, grasping propositions should contain a few well-sounding, liberal, and patriotic phrases. This bill starts off quite harmlessly and provides that such Bureau shall cooperate with the several States in the construction and improvement of permanent public roads, in making investigations and experiments in regard to the best methods of road making and the best road-making materials, in object-lesson roads, in publishing and distributing bulletins and reports on the subject of road improvement, and in bringing about a uniform system of repair, improvement, and construction of public roads, and winds up with an appropriation from the Public Treasury of $24,000,000, "the said appropriation to be available at the rate of $8,000,000 a year during the years 1906, 1907, and 1908."

How we can turn backward and spend those millions in 1906 and 1907 I leave to the gentleman's resourcefulness. It provides for the distribution of this money as follows:

No State shall receive in any one year less than $100,000 of the sum hereby appropriated, nor a larger proportion of the sum hereby appropriated than its population bears to the total population of the United States, based upon the census of 1900: Provided, That in computing the population of any State no city thereof shall be credited with more than 10,000 inhabitants.

This is not only retroactive, but more decidedly jug-handled than the others against New York, which has many cities of more than 10,000. It further provides that the work shall be done under commissioners of highways and engineers, all in the employ of and paid by the Federal Government; that half of the expense of such public highways in every State or civil subdivision thereof shall be paid by the Treasury of the United States and half by the State or the civil subdivision thereof which shall receive credit on their half for all labor, materials, and machinery used in the construction or improvement of such highways. In other words, they would work out their half, and farmers know what that means.

The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LEE] on December 5, 1907, introduced a bill substantially like the Patterson bill, with the same retroactive clause, but it does not discriminate against States containing large cities.

On the same day, December 5, 1907, the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MAYNARD] introduced a bill, which is word for word like the Lee bill, including the retroactive clause.

On February 12, 1908, the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BELL] introduced a bill not exactly word for word, but very much like the Lee and Maynard bills, except that it provides for an appropriation of $100,000,000, to be available in five annual installments, and provides further that no State or Territory shall receive in any year an amount larger than $1,000,000 nor less than $250,000. Again a discrimination in favor of the small States and against the large ones.

On December 2, 1907, the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BROWNLOW] introduced a bill exactly like the Lee and Maynard bills, except the retroactive clause. Although a Republican, he seems to have caught the Southern fever for a raid on the Federal Treasury, and whether he got the inspiration from the gentlemen whose bills are like his, or whether they copied one of his old bills, I will leave to those gentlemen to determine among themselves.

On March 12, 1908, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. LAMAR] introduced a bill differing only in details from the four bills last above-mentioned. It carries an appropriation of $50,000,000, to be raised by the sale of bonds if there is no money in the Treasury, and provides that—

No city or town having a population of more than 6,000 inhabitants, as determined by the census of 1900, shall be entitled to the provisions of this act.

On December 10, 1907, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Cox] introduced a bill substantially like the five bills last mentioned. In fact, these six bills bear unmistakable evidence of a common source, and whether the idea emanated from the brain of one of these Representatives or from some propaganda I will not venture to guess.

The Cox bill provides for the construction of only post-roads; but if all highways over which rural free-delivery carriers travel are held to be post-roads, the proposition is nearly as extravagant and paternalistic as the others.

On the 7th of February, 1908, the gentleman from New York [Mr. SULZER] introduced a bill which is entirely different from all the others, and is much more original than practical or sensible. It provides that the nation shall loan to the several States and Territories money for the construction and improvement of post-roads. There is no limit to the amount which any State or Territory may borrow or that the Secretary of the Treasury may loan. No interest is required if the principal is paid when due, and no povision is made for the enforcement of such payments. Twenty billions of dollars would not construct good roads throughout this country, and the gentleman does not suggest where it will come from. He provides for spending it in the same reckless and wholesale manner as if it came out of the clouds. But it does not. It comes out of the people, and if the reign of extravagance proposed in these bills is inaugurated new taxes in some form will have to be levied.

On the 30th of January, 1908, the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. CURRIER] introduced a bill for the construction of roads by the National Government and at its expense. It creates a national highways commission, to be appointed by the President, refers to the promotion of interstate commerce and trade and the postal service, and embodies certain phrases which sound within the commerce and postal clauses of the Constitution, and carries an appropriation of $50,000,000, to be expended at the rate of ten millions a year for five years, and that not less than $500,000 thereof shall be expended in each State. The gentleman says it was introduced at the request of the master of the National Grange, who lives in the State of New Hampshire. Naturally that gentleman would like it, for his State would get a great advantage.

New York had, according to the last Federal census, more than seventeen times the population of New Hampshire, and in the next census will have twenty times her population; and yet New Hampshire is assured as much assistance from the Federal Treasury in this bill as is New York.

Nevada with 42,335 inhabitants, Wyoming with 92,531, Idaho with 161,722, and Delaware with 184,735, are put on an equal footing with my State in the distribution of this $50,000,000, which, according to the same census, had 7,264,894 inhabitants.

It is true that after each State, large and small, receives $500,000, there will remain $27,000,000 for distribution, for which no provision is made. The small States would have received several times their equitable proportions, but they would be none the less greedy for all they could get of the balance. That would mean wire-pulling and log-rolling and an unseemly and disgraceful scramble for the contents of that rich pork barrel.

Large and rich States never get their equitable share of patronage from the National Government, for the reason that their delegations in Congress do not combine with a common purpose and for a common end with the same diligence and determination which are manifested by the delegations from small States. A State with only one Representative has two Senators who equalize the vote of the Senators from the Empire State.

There are no rules in the Senate, and those gentlemen, by methods with which they are familiar, can hold up legislation until they get practically what they want for their States. There are twenty-nine States in this Union in none of which is as large, rich, enterprising, or prosperous a city as Syracuse; and if it were in one of those States the two Senators and all the Members from the State would be proud of it, and would unite with determination to get what it wanted, and its demand for a post-office would not be put off and neglected the way Syracuse has been neglected.

If the construction of highways is a strictly national affair for the promotion of interstate commerce, why assure to each State, large and small, an equal part without regard to the needs of such States or the benefit to commerce by the expenditure of such sums? And if it is a State affair, why not divide it among the States in proportion to their populations? This proposition is neither, but a combination of both. It is national so far as getting the money from the Treasury is concerned, and it is State so far as its division and distribution are concerned. Aside from the question of constitutionality, paternalism, and national socialism, the Empire State can not afford to go into the pool for road building provided for in this bill, or in any other bill which has been introduced in Congress up to this date. It has more population and wealth than any other State, and doubtless contributes as much, and perhaps more, per capita than any other to the National Treasury; and yet it would receive but a very niggardly proportion of the sums drawn from that Treasury according to the most liberal and equitable proposition to which I have referred.

All the gentlemen who have introduced bills on this subject, except the gentleman from New Hampshire, represent States of large areas, many and long highways, and sparse populations. They can well afford to go into partnership with the rich, thickly settled, and highly improved States for the construction of their country roads, especially when they exclude cities from consideration the citizens whereof may contribute and get no return. The rural districts of New York State better stay in partnership with our great cities, which help build their roads, than be inveigled into the scheme proposed by these enterprising Southern gentlemen, and that is exactly what they are doing.

We adopted a constitutional amendment to bond our State for $50,000,000 for the improvement of our roads. Those bonds are a lien upon city blocks as well as on farms. They will be paid by saloons, hotels, corporations, and estates of deceased millionaires, and other indirect taxes. Our State is thickly settled. Our people are industrious and enterprising. They have been for years working on their highways, and many of them are fairly good. Our engineers know more about road construction than those in the Federal employ, because they have had more experience in that work. Our farmers are not busy all the time talking about State rights and sovereignty, but they are doing the things which a State should do. If our Southern friends would talk less and work more they would not be in such dire need of national aid.

Mr. Chairman, I wonder if the gentlemen who have introduced all these bills fully realize what sized proposition they are endeavoring to force upon this Government. They want good roads, but they cost much money. Under the Higby-Armstrong act passed by the New York legislature, 28 miles of road have been completed, or are in process of construction, in the county of Onondaga, N. Y., and the cost per mile shows an average of $11,845.33. In some ports of our country road construction may be cheaper, but in other parts much more expensive on account of mountains, morasses, and other physical difficulties. But take these figures as an average cost. On March 1, 1908, there were established and in operation 38,852 rural free-delivery routes, which average about 24 miles. At a cost of $11,845.33 per mile their construction would reach the aggregate sum of $11,045,154,267.84. The roads in our county have been built by contract and by the lowest bidder. Nearly all the bills to which I have referred provide that the work be done directly by the Government, and some provide for eight-hour days, and impose other conditions under which the same work would cost much more.

Some of the bills provide that the States or municipal subdivisions thereof would contribute one-half the expense by working out their share. Make any allowance you please, and the undertaking is so large and expensive as to stagger any man possessed of a grain of conservatism. It is also a pretty large investment in order that a lone letter carrier may have a good road to travel over once a day; and that is the only legal or constitutional excuse or apology offered for this tremendous expenditure on the part of the National Government.

One hundred miles of road in each State would, according to these figures, cost $54,488,518, and much more than that sum for the kind of road specified by the gentleman from Florida [Mr. CLARK]. And yet he nonchalantly appropriates the sum of $5,000,000 for this work, to be available as needed, in the judgment of the Secretary of War. That official would have a pretty hard time spreading that sum over the work proposed to be done by this gentleman.

I have set forth these facts at some length for the information of our granges and other agricultural societies who may have approved some of these propositions for the construction of their roads without considering all sides of the question and their ultimate effect on their own interests. It is generally well to consider the cost of a proposition and the motive which prompts it. "Beware of the Greeks bearing gifts," and beware of the financial disaster into which some of our good friends seem disposed to launch our Uncle Samuel.

All these bills except three emanate from Southern States. Two of those three are from Northern Democrats, and only one from a Northern Republican; and the gentleman who fathers that bill may plead in mitigation the fact that his State profits at the expense of her sister States.

Mr. Chairman, this multitude of bills introduced by our Southern friends, representing several different States, authorizing and directing the National Government to do things which the States themselves should do, leads me to the conclusion that they are not faithful to the traditions and teachings of their political ancestors. They are political descendants of the great John C. Calhoun, to whom they frequently refer and liberally quote. He and his school of statesmen believed in a strict construction of the Constitution. It was a vital issue with them, for on it depended the maintenance of slavery. Southern Senators and Representatives of his time clung to it with a tenacity and consistency which were admirable. No personal advantage, no State interest caused them to yield their position for an instant. But the present generation of Southern statesmen seems disposed to yield whenever there is an opportunity to get some benefit. Our tariff system, which they score so roundly, and our revenue system, have been highly successful, at all events in pouring into the Federal Treasury streams of cash. Our coffers have been overflowing, and many of the States are poor, among them some of the Southern States; and their notion of States rights now seems to be the right to dip into the Treasury on every possible excuse. They are opposed to paternalism in their speeches; but when there is a chance to secure some benefit for their districts or States they fling their principles to the winds and dip into the Treasury as deep as possible.

When a scheme for the irrigation of arid lands is projected, the gentlemen from Texas support it and smile at the theory that each State should take care of its own territory. When a national quarantine bill is introduced the gentlemen from Texas oppose it on the theory that it is an invasion of States rights and altogether too paternalistic, while the Representatives from Louisiana and other Gulf States are its strongest advocates. They waive their objections to paternalism and implore the National Government to fight yellow fever and other epidemics. Southern cotton planters are imploring the National Government for large appropriations for the extermination of the boll weevil. The invasion of States rights and paternalism have no terrors for them. New York digs its own barge canal at a tremendous expense, while Virginia and North Carolina are demanding that their internal waterway be excavated by the National Government. New York buys and protects its own forest reserves, while the States bordering on the Southern Appalachians are appealing to Congress to buy their mountain ranges at good prices. Just how they expect to accomplish that, whether by condemnation or agreement with the lumber speculators who have stripped off all the timber and want to sell them to Uncle Samuel for several times what they cost, does not appear. However, they are entirely willing to admit the authority of the national law, and a small army of national agents for the execution of that law, within their borders. And now the policy and business of building and improving ordinary highways find their principal and most earnest advocates in the Southern States.

Some of these gentlemen, in order to avoid paternalism and other theories against which they are committed, would take the money from the Treasury and distribute it among the States to be expended by such States; while others would have the Federal employees and officials go into the several States and build roads in their own way and at the expense of the Federal Treasury. They are willing to make any concession in the way of principle and prejudice if they can get the National Government to do their work.

I make these suggestions, not in the way of censure or criticism. I entertain for these gentlemen a high degree of respect and admiration. Southern Democrats exact from their public servants as high a degree of official honesty as do Northern Republicans. They are, as a rule, able and patriotic. They love the Southland. It was the home of their ancestors for many generations, when they were in more affluent circumstances and exercised a more powerful influence on national affairs. They love their States and are loyal to them. They believe in the full measure of States rights and are opposed to the growth of paternalism on the part of the National Government. That is to them an inheritance. But when a proposition is made to give them some relief, benefit, or advantage at the expense of the National Treasury, it is a condition and not a theory which then confronts them. They are human and yield to the demands of their constituents, or they agitate some proposition of this sort in order to make themselves more popular in their several districts.

I am persuaded that the representatives from the old Northern States are in fact more consistent defenders of the rights of the States, and more determined opponents of the present growing paternalism and centralization than are their colleagues from the reconstructed States.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I move to strike out the last word. I wish to say a few words upon the subject which has just been discussed by my good friend. Mr. Chairman, I do not believe in the advisability or the wisdom or the policy of the Federal Government going into a State and building roads, to maintain them, and to exercise acts of sovereignty or control over them. I wish I could add that I do not believe that the Federal Government has the constitutional power to do so. I can not in good faith deny the constitutional power to construct and maintain post-roads. It was exercised early in the history of the country, and although subsequent bills were vetoed by Democratic Presidents, as strict a constructionist as John C. Calhoun himself maintained the right of the Federal Government to construct roads; and prior to the vetoes by Monroe and Madison, Jefferson had approved such a bill, passed by a Congress many of whose Members had helped to frame the Constitution. But I do not believe in the wisdom of it nor the policy of it; and I believe the exercise of the power, even though constitutional, would carry Federal control and centralization further than it ought to go.

Now, the bill insisted on and introduced by me merely proceeds to do this: It proposes to take out of the surplus in the Treasury, as long as there is a surplus, out of money already collected and belonging to the Federal Government, which has got to be distributed in some way, $25,000,000 per annum, and distribute it among the States in trust, wherewith they—the States—may construct good roads on postal routes. This is following a precedent established away back before the war—I believe it was in General Jackson's time, though I have forgotten—when the surplus in the Treasury was distributed among the States for purposes of internal improvement.

Mr. SCOTT. Does the gentleman think the results of that distribution were so happy as to warrant us in following the precedent?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Into that I do not care to go fully at this moment, because it would consume most of my time. I may say, under conditions, my reply would be that if these funds were to be used, or, rather, misused and diverted, in precisely the same way the former distribution was, I would have fear for it, because undoubtedly the States, a good many of them, did abuse then the trust reposed in them and misappropriated or wasted the money.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I can not, because objection will be made to extending my time.

Mr. MANN. How can objection be made? The gentleman can not object to his own request.

Mr. MADDEN. One question——

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from New York is waiting to object. I know what is going on in the House. [Laughter.] I will be glad to answer the gentleman any question when I get through if I have the time, or if the House gives it to me.

Now, Mr. Chairman, in order to prevent the very trouble which has been suggested by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. SCOTT], I have provided in this bill that whenever any State shall misappropriate or misuse the money distributed to it for road making during any one year that it shall not be entitled to any further distribution until it shall first have devoted an equal sum of its own money to road making satisfactorily to the Secretary of the Treasury and shall have proven the fact of such actual expenditure to him and to his satisfaction, and that would forestall and prevent the abuse which occurred under the former distribution of surplus to the States for internal improvement.

Under my bill the Federal Government has nothing to do with the roads in the States—either their construction, maintenance, or control. It has simply to distribute to the States as trustees, according to a rule laid down in the bill, $25,000,000 annually out of the surplus in the Treasury lying there and doing no good, and now being loaned to the national banks without interest; the States to use the amount for the construction of good roads; and the only string that the Federal Government under my bill has upon the distribution or use of the fund is what I have a moment ago stated, to wit, that if any State shall misappropriate the fund, then that particular State shall not be entitled to succeeding distributions.

Now, as to the method of distribution. The purpose is to build good roads, and therefore it would be absurd to say that the money should be distributed to the States in proportion to their population.

The State of Rhode Island, with very large cities and a very small mileage of road, counting even city streets as roads, would get a disproportionate amount of money for the purposes for which the bill was intended to provide. So that my bill provides——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired.

Mr. PAYNE. I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Mississippi be extended five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Mississippi be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, in return for that courtesy, I shall not object to the extension of any time upon that side of the Chamber for the balance of this afternoon, as long as this particular matter is being discussed. [Laughter.]

Mr. PAYNE. I wanted to see how consistent my friend would be.

Mr. DRISCOLL. The gentleman says the distribution of this surplus pro rata according to the population of the several States would be absurd on account of the proposition contained in the bill; but I ask the gentleman why he incorporated that idea in the first bill which he introduced on the subject, on December 3 last?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Simply because "Homer himself at times nods," and "the gentleman from Mississippi" at that time did not think of this patent injustice as it subsequently suggested itself to his mind. In the first bill that I introduced the money was to be distributed in proportion to population.

Mr. DRISCOLL. Was it not because some other gentlemen from that section called attention to it and introduced bills providing that the money should not be expended according to the population of the several States, and therefore the gentleman from Mississippi took the cue and changed his bill?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I did not see any other bill before changing that provision in mine. I do not remember whether some other gentleman called my attention to the patent injustice or whether I myself thought of it of my own volition, but whichever way it was I did see it, and in the bill which I subsequently introduced I corrected it. Now, as a matter of course, if you are going to distribute a certain amount of money to the States for road making you want it to go to build roads, and you want it, therefore, to go in proportion to the necessity existing for roads, and therefore it would be fairer to distribute the amount in proportion to the possible mileage of roads than it would be in proportion to population.

But that would be unfair, too, in a way, and therefore it struck me afterwards that a compromise or middle way would be better; that it should be distributed to the States and Territories in proportion to their population, subtracting from the total population of a State the population of cities and towns of 50,000 souls. Now, for example, suppose you distributed it in proportion to population; take, if you will, the great State of Washington and the little State of Rhode Island.

Mr. DRISCOLL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILLIAMS. You would give the State of Rhode Island a very disproportionate amount of money in comparison with its necessities for roads, or even its possibilities for roads, or room for roads, and roads are, remember, the purpose of the bill; whereas you would give the State of Washington a disproportionately small amount in comparison with the necessity for roads. Therefore——

Mr. DRISCOLL. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. WILLIAMS. No gentleman can keep his head in expressing ideas if he can not finish his sentence. Now, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE], at the beginning of this session, took up this bill with some other matters of criticism of me.

I wish to refer to the provisions of my bill so that I may never again be charged with wanting to carry the Federal Government into the States a road making.

I do not believe that the Federal Government ought to go out and levy taxes in order to provide money, even to intrust to the State as trustee, to build good roads. My only excuse for the bill is that a surplus has already been collected and is in the Treasury, and it ought to be put out to work among the people to do the most possible and the best work for the people. If we had a Democratic Administration, upon real and true Democratic lines, there would be no necessity for a bill of this sort, because you would leave the money in the pockets of the people, so that the people could pay it in the shape of taxes to the State and counties, and they could expend it for good roads and for other useful purposes. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

I do not believe in keeping up a surplus in the Treasury of the United States. I believe that any Government which maintains a surplus is inviting corruption and inviting extravagance. But a great Democrat once said, "I am confronted by a condition and not a theory." Here you have a surplus and what are you doing with it? You are now lending it out to the banks without a dollar of interest, to enable them to finance questionable enterprises of every description.

I say that you ought to take that money and put it into rivers and harbors and public buildings, and give it to the States for the purpose of constructing good roads—in a word, invest it to bring dividends to the people and to posterity. You ought to use that money so that it should contribute to the material prosperity, progress, and advancement of the individual citizen and of the various locales of the American Union—the counties and the State.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, I did not finish reading the bill. I will do that later.

Mr. MANN. Why does not the gentleman from Mississippi ask unanimous consent to insert it?

Mr. DRISCOLL. Mr. Chairman, since the great leaders have declared a truce for the afternoon and fallen upon each other's neck, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD, and I will insert both bills of the gentleman from Mississippi. [Laughter.]

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not see what need there is of inserting the first one, as I am standing on the second. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, when an American citizen goes out gunning for votes he is quite apt to get himself into difficulty. It is true that formerly in our history there was a surplus in the Treasury that was divided among the States, deposited in the various States, according to population. Some of that money was wasted; some States, like my own State, put it to a good and useful purpose. They loaned it out on bonds and mortgages, and they used the proceeds of the bonds and mortgages in school funds, the benefits of which our schools are getting to-day.

There is a surplus in the Treasury now, and is liable to be perhaps for some time to come. It will be taken care of if we can extend our banking system in some direction so as to relieve the difficulty that there is and release the bonded indebtedness of the United States as security for the currency. Then the money can be used in paying the debts of the United States. People look anxiously toward that surplus. The farmers would like some of it, no doubt, and other people in the United States would like it.

Here is the opportunity for gentlemen to come in. The farmers have votes, and votes may possibly be influenced by some idea of having a decreased taxation for highway improvement, although I believe that the average voter of the United States is far above any temptation or bribery of that kind.

The gentleman from Mississippi realizes these facts, and he wants to meet the emergency. What does he do? He comes in with the subterfuge—because he does not believe in paternalism; he does not believe that the Government of the United States should step in and do everything that the citizen needs unless he can keep one eye closed at the time he is doing it—he comes in with a bill that the United States shall furnish the money to the sovereign States to take care of the roads in the United States. Not content with that, he proposes to eliminate the populations of the city, who certainly have contributed as much toward the surplus in the Treasury as the farmers in the State of Mississippi; he proposes to eliminate them in his great distribution of these funds. He proposes to bribe the voters of the United States by eliminating the cities from the calculation and distribute it only according to the votes of the farming districts outside of the cities of 50,000 people. Now, he can not deceive the people by any such subterfuge.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. PAYNE. They know it is paternalism. The United States is to do the business. They are to furnish the money and they are to keep a string on it. If the States do not work according to the plan of the United States, then they are not to participate in the next year's contribution. What difference is there whether the sovereign States do this work or some superintendent down in Yazoo City?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. PAYNE. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I understand that the gentleman has charged that this bill, if it pass, giving to the farmers chiefly the benefits accruing to them, would be a bribe to the farming classes. Does the gentleman think it any more iniquitous to bribe the farmers of the country than it is to bribe the manufacturers?

Mr. BURLESON. Or the bankers?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Or the bankers?

Mr. PAYNE. No; I do not.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I am glad to hear that admission.

Mr. PAYNE. And I hope the gentleman will join with me and not bribe anybody. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. WILLIAMS. Your protective tariff has bribed the manufacturers and the national-bank laws have bribed the bankers.

Mr. PAYNE. To be sure, the farmers are in the majority. They constitute over one-third of our population in the United States. They are the biggest class who could vote, but I do not believe in any such proposition as this, and I do not care what grange in my district passes a resolution, without thinking the matter over; I have the same answer to them that I make now. I am opposed to the Federal Government going into the general business of road building in the United States, whether it is under the thin guise of distributing a surplus to the States, according to the farming population, or any other scheme that the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] or any other gentleman can devise.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Is the gentleman opposed to taking any part of the public revenues and building up rural-route roads or rural bridges?

Mr. PAYNE. Oh, that is too thin a proposition.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. It is not thin at all.

Mr. PAYNE. And there is not one of the gentleman's constituents—not one out of a hundred—who will believe him in earnest when he talks about building up their rural-delivery routes.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I am a heap more "in earnest" than the gentleman was when he kicked against raising the rural appropriation in 1898 from $150,000 to $300,000.

Mr. PAYNE. Look at the State of New York. It is issuing $50,000,000 of bonds to build good roads. Look at every county and locality in my State. They are working in the building of good roads. They do not ask the Federal Government for aid. That is a State. The people of that State do not shout that New York is a sovereign State every fifteen minutes in the day, and they furnish an example to you gentlemen on the other side representing States from another locality, who shout "Sovereignty, sovereignty, sovereign States!" morning, noon, and night, and who are trying to get their hands into the Federal Treasury all the time and have the National Government do what your State governments ought to be proud to do. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, this discussion is reaching out and taking in matters that are very acute. People down in my district do not see the difference between the "surplus," so called, and——

Mr. MANN. A deficit? [Laughter.]

Mr. SIMS. And any other money in the Treasury. When they want money to build good roads, they will take the "surplus" or they will help to make a surplus. Now, I do not think we can do by indirection what we can not do by direction. If we can not levy a tax to put a fund in the Public Treasury of the United States with which to build roads, we should not use a surplus collected by Federal taxation for such a purpose, and I do not see any use in whipping the devil around the stump. Let us go at it straight or not go at it at all. What nation ever has a surplus as long as it has an unpaid indebtedness? What individual has a surplus of money as long as he is in debt?

It is true we may have a "surplus" for the current year, but once let the people receive aid from the Federal Treasury and then put us Democrats in, and let us reduce taxes to a revenue basis and stop the surplus, then where will we be? [Applause and laughter on the Republican side.] Having once received that "surplus," what would they say if it should cease to exist from any cause?

Mr. COCKS of New York. "Give us some more."

Mr. SIMS. They would say, "If you have not got sense enough to create a 'surplus,' if it takes a 'surplus' to get what we want, get out, and we will send men who have." [Applause and laughter on the Republican side.] If it is right, Mr. Chairman, and constitutional to levy a tax to build public roads and post-roads, or to assist the States in doing so, let us do it straight from the shoulder and not limit it to a "surplus," which is only incidental and will vanish if taxes are reduced. The United States Government should never have a "surplus." We should never collect one dollar more than enough to pay necessary expenses. The crying evil of the present day in Federal taxation is in collecting vastly more than we need, which has become a "tempting surplus;" it tempts us to make extravagant appropriations and to invent and devise ways and means to cover up and excuse our extravagance.

Reduce the tariff and stop the surplus from being created and not take money that is in the Treasury which should be paid upon our debts and deposit it, as was done a few weeks ago, in banks in order that they might lend it out in Wall street on call at rates reaching as high as 100 per cent. Mr. Chairman, I am not now undertaking to determine the question, but if this proposition is constitutional, we will come to it sooner or later, because it has been widely discussed all over the country, and the farmers all over the United States have resolved in favor of it, and they are going to have it if it is constitutional, so we had just as well face the situation and face it bravely, and either advocate it unconditionally or oppose it unconditionally. [Applause.]

[Mr. COX of Indiana addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, a while ago I was diverted from my purpose of reading my bill, and I now want to insert it in the RECORD, and I want the Members of the House to hear it read so that they shall know I have not deflected one particle from the time-honored belief on my part of not having Federal interference in the affairs of the States.

Mr. SCOTT. I understand the gentleman, by mistake, read from a bill which was not his own, and he now wants to correct that mistake.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I read from the wrong bill. I did not finish reading it, because before I got through I found it was another bill.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman could not distinguish.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The opening or first sections of the bills were identical. Now, I ask your attention to the bill:

A bill (H. R. 16071) to distribute the surplus in the Treasury of the United States to the several States, Territories, and the District of Columbia for the sole purpose of improving the roads therein.

Be it enacted, etc., That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury at the end of each fiscal year to take an account of all the funds in the Treasury of the United States and after deducting from said sum the amounts required by law to be kept in said Treasury the remainder, if any, shall be declared a surplus.

SEC. 2. That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to provide immediately for the distribution out of said surplus, not exceeding $25,000,000 annually during the continuance of this law, on a per capita basis to the States, Territories, and the District of Columbia, to be computed from the last general census taken by the national authorities, excluding, however, from the population of each State the population of all cities within said State of 50,000 souls or over, and shall prorate the same accordingly, for the sole purpose of improving the postal roads—in said States, Territories, and District of Columbia, under such rules and regulations as the States, Territories, and District of Columbia may provide; and said Secretary shall immediately notify the governors of said States and Territories and the Commissioners of the District of Columbia of the amounts due each, and that the same will be paid over to such person or persons as may be duly authorized by said States, Territories, and the District of Columbia to receive and receipt for the same.

Post roads, note. No other roads, now—

SEC. 3. That should any State, Territory, or District divert said funds for any purpose other than the improvement of the postal roads that they shall not be allowed to participate in any further distribution of said funds until said State shall show to the satisfaction of the Secretary of the Treasury—that a like amount so diverted has been expended from the treasury of said State, Territory, or District so diverting the same in a judicious manner upon the postal roads of said State, Territory, or District diverting the same.

SEC. 4. That it shall be the duty of the governors of the several States and Territories and the Commissioners of the District of Columbia to make a full and complete report to the Secretary of the Treasury on the 15th day of November each year what legislation, rules, and regulations have been adopted for the expenditure of said funds upon the postal roads, the manner in which the same has been spent, and the results accomplished. And it shall be the duty of said Secretary to submit said reports to Congress on the first day of each regular session.

And there is no further distribution until the State abusing its trust has actually placed in the shape of public roads an equal amount of money, and has proved to the Secretary of the Treasury that the amount came out of its own treasury.

If there is a man in the world, no matter of what intellectual ingenuity, who can find that I am giving in that bill the Federal Government any right of construction, maintenance, or control, or sovereignty over a road in a State, such ingenuity must be equal to that of his satanic majesty himself.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CURRIER. Mr. Chairman, I introduced a bill here prepared by the National Grange, and it was introduced by me at the request of the master of the National Grange, who lives in my State. I should be glad to have the gentleman print that bill as a part of his remarks, for I have no apology to offer here for the introduction of it. With that general plan I am in entire sympathy. I believe that the farmers of this country may well be aided to some extent from the Federal Treasury in improving their communications. Hundreds of millions are spent in improving streams for the benefit of the farmers living near those streams. If that can be constitutionally done, and I think all must concede that it can, why not spend some money for the benefit of those who live remote from the navigable streams? [Applause.]

I wish to print as a part of my remarks a paper prepared by the National Grange, and I wish to say to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. COX] that I doubt the wisdom of making it a condition precedent to securing Federal aid to require the local political subdivision to appropriate money. Work by the Federal Government in any political subdivision of this country would stimulate road making everywhere, but to make it an absolute condition precedent to the same might prevent the building of roads in localities where they are needed the most.

STATEMENT OF LEGISLATIVE COMMITTEE, NATIONAL GRANGE.

This bill embodies the principle of Federal assistance for public highway improvement favored by the National Grange, an organization of farmers numbering nearly 1,000,000, with local granges in all sections of the United States. The members of this organization believe that there is an urgent necessity for the adoption of a broad, comprehensive policy of public-road improvement by the various township, county, and State authorities, and that the National Government should cooperate, with a view to establishing a complete system of properly constructed highways.

The Federal Government carries on the work of improving our rivers and harbors because of their importance to the commerce of the country as a whole. We believe that the improvement of the public highways is of even greater importance to the people of the entire country, and that it is only fair and reasonable that a portion of the national revenues should be devoted to a purpose that affects every industrial interest and will benefit the trade and commerce of every section of the United States.

The work of the highways commission provided for by this bill will greatly stimulate interest in the construction of better roads by the local and State authorities having charge of the public highways, and will result in giving this country what the wealth and intelligence of its people entitle it to—the best public-road system of any country in the world. For these reasons we would respectfully ask that you give House bill 15837 your favorable consideration and use your influence in favor of its enactment by Congress in the near future.

Yours, respectfully,

NAHUM J. BACHELDER, Concord, N. H.,
T. C. ATKESON, Morganstown, W. Va.,
AARON JONES, South Bend, Ind.,
Legislative Committee National Grange.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, it is not my intention to discuss the proposition of Federal aid to road building in the United States. It is a most important question, but this is not the place to discuss it. I hope with the few remarks I shall make we may get back to business—to work. I desire to insert in the RECORD a statement of the appropriations made for the Office of Public Roads as a reply to the gentleman from New York [Mr. DRISCOLL], who made the statement that the appropriations for this Bureau had been increasing very rapidly, and rather intimated that there had been extravagance in the appropriations for this work. It is true the appropriations have increased rather rapidly, but not out of proportion to other bureaus in the Department, and certainly not out of proportion to the great importance of its work in promoting road building throughout the country.

The first appropriation for this Bureau was made in 1894, an appropriation of $10,000. For the next year, 1895, the appropriation was continued at $10,000. For the fiscal year 1896 the appropriation was actually reduced to $8,000, and for the year 1897 it was held at $8,000. For the year 1898 it was still $8,000, and for the year 1899 it was still $8,000. For the year of 1900 the appropriation was $14,000; for 1901, $20,000; for 1902, $30,000, an increase of $10,000; for 1903 it was $35,000, an increase of $5,000; for 1904 the appropriation was the same as 1903—$35,000, and for 1905 the appropriation was $50,000. For 1906 it was $70,000, and for 1907 the appropriation continued at $70,000; and the amount recommended by the committee for the coming fiscal year is $87,000, an increase of $17,000, and this increase is warranted without doubt.

The appropriation has increased in fourteen years from $10,000 to $87,000, and it is this fact that has led gentlemen to believe that we have been overgenerous with this Bureau. The fact is that the interest in road building has increased year after year. The determination of the people that they shall have good roads over which to travel, the inauguration of rural delivery and the conditions as to roads thrown about that service, the increase in the use of automobiles, and the more general interest shown for the whole matter by the entire people, rural and urban, have all contributed to make heavy demands upon this Office of Public Roads. Expert advice must be given, road engineers sent out, model roads built, and all this takes money. I do not think, however, that the charge of extravagant appropriation can justly lie against the amounts given this branch of the service when its great work is considered and the interests it deals with are taken into account.

Mr. Chairman, the committee feels that this Bureau is doing a great work and promises even better work for the future for the people of the United States in giving expert advice and promoting the cause of good roads, in inspiring progress along these lines and in teaching the best methods of road building; and whether we are in favor of or against the proposition of Federal aid to roads, the fact remains that this Bureau is the teacher and leader in the movement for better roads in the country, the pioneer in this great forward step for the general good, and we ought to maintain it by decent, respectable appropriations made generously and liberally from time to time. [Applause.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD rose.

Mr. SCOTT. I suggest to the gentleman from Alabama that we have not read the general expenses paragraph for this Bureau, and we ought to have debate close on the present paragraph. I move that debate be now closed on the present paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas moves that debate now close upon the pending paragraph.

Mr. SULZER. I object; I would like to say a few words.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I wish to offer a separate paragraph at this time, which, I believe, would be in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

After line 7, page 43, add the following paragraph:

"To enable the Secretary of Agriculture to build experimental post-roads in the United States, $500,000."

Mr. SCOTT. I make the point of order against that.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I am not sure that it would be subject to the point of order, but I ask the gentleman to withhold it.

Mr. SCOTT. I will reserve the point of order.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, objection is made to this appropriation looking to the improvement of our public-road system on the ground that it invades the reserved powers of the States. I wish to say that there is no man on the floor of this House more jealous in his desire to protect the reserved rights of the States than I am. I believe the sovereign States composing the Union have their duties to perform and should perform them without aid or hindrance on the part of the Federal Government. I do not believe the Central Government should enter into the legislative fields that belong solely to the States, but I believe that the Federal Government, within its well-defined powers, has its duty to perform under the powers given it by the Constitution; that it should give force and effect to the grants of power given it by the States, and one of these grants of power, to use the language of the Constitution, is "to establish post-offices and post-roads."

There can be no question whatever that the Constitution carries the power to build post-roads in the United States. To establish post-offices means to build post-offices, and to establish post-roads means to build post-roads. Gentlemen may scoff at the proposition and say that the fathers did not contemplate our present development and modern methods of transportation; that they contemplated building roads to carry the mail through the wilderness and did not dream of a time coming when the mail could be delivered at every farmer's door. But I want to say, Mr. Chairman, that the need for post-roads in the United States was no greater in the days of the fathers than to-day. In fact, the action of the Congress itself has brought about the necessity for building post-roads. This Government in its very beginning, in the first decades of our national existence, entered upon an era of building great highways between the States. Democratic Congresses appropriated the money, and Democratic Executives built these roads; and if it had not been for the fact that the development of railroads came along just at the time of the beginning of this era of building good roads in the United States, to-day we would have had as magnificent a system of public roads built by the Government of the United States as any country in the civilized world.

Mr. KEIFER. I would like to ask what public roads the Government ever built?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Why, it built one that runs into the gentleman's own State—the Cumberland road.

Mr. KEIFER. Not at all. The Government built that under the provisions of internal improvement and did not build it as a post-road expressly.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It built the road.

Mr. KEIFER. And one of the Democratic Presidents vetoed a bill because he did not believe it came within the provisions of the Constitution. It was a bill to appropriate money for a national road. I wish the gentleman would name one road that the Government has built.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Why, it built a road running into Ohio.

Mr. KEIFER. Oh, no; not as a post-road.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If the gentleman will allow me to hold the floor, I will answer him.

Mr. KEIFER. I beg the gentleman's pardon.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The Government built the Cumberland road. The first contract for the road was concluded in the spring of 1811. The opening up of the Ohio route was balanced by a provision for a road from the frontier of Georgia leading toward New Orleans, and one from Nashville to Natchez. These roads are good roads to-day, and it matters not that President Monroe vetoed a bill because he did not believe the Government had the power to build them. Nevertheless, the indisputable fact remains that under Democratic Administrations appropriations were made by Democratic Congresses to build these roads. They were built, and they are in existence to-day. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I am not at all surprised at the opposition to the building of good post-roads in this country coming from the Republican leadership of the House. The Republican party has plumed itself on what it has done for the people, on the progress it has made, but so far as my recollection goes it is an idle boast. I have never seen the Republican leaders of the House of Representatives favor legislation that was intended to benefit the masses of the common people of the country or engage in the work of developing the natural resources for the common good and not in the interest of trusts and monopolies except when they were driven to it by their political opponents.

Let me call your attention to the fact that one of the best bills, from an economic standpoint, that has ever been passed by the House of Representatives, was the bill for the irrigation of the arid lands of the West, and when that bill came before this House it was reported by the Democrats on the Irrigation Committee and two or three Western Republicans, with the leaders of the Republicans on that committee against it. When it came up for consideration in the House, the entire leadership of the Republican side fought the bill and tried to defeat it by dilatory tactics, and it took a solid Democratic vote, coupled with the Western Republican vote, to pass the bill and put it on the statute books. There is no economic bill that has been passed within the last two decades that has done more good for the common masses of the people, and built more homes and given more opportunities for homestead settlement, than this same irrigation bill that your Republican leaders tried to defeat.

When we came to consider the inauguration of the rural free-delivery routes, we did not start in at once on a full service. We first passed an appropriation for experimental rural free-delivery service. It had hardly been initiated before the motion came from the leadership on the Republican side of the House, backed up by the then chairman of the Post-Office Committee, to destroy the whole system by letting it out on contracts, by putting it on the basis of the star-route service. Then again it took the Democratic vote on this side of the House, coupled with some of the Republican votes, to save the life of the system. To-day the rural mail delivery is doing more good to the farming people than half the other laws you have on the statute books; it is carrying education to the homes of the farmers and making farm life more attractive to the young men of the country. To-day we find the leadership on the Republican side of the House fighting the proposition to build post-roads as authorized by the Constitution, when it is our plain duty to build them and carry out the constitutional provision. But there is a growing sentiment in this country in favor of doing this. The Democratic membership of the House stand in favor of the proposition, and they will ultimately write it on the statute books.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Where does the gentleman find anything in the Constitution authorizing the Federal Government to build post-roads?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Why, it is very clear. The Constitution gives the power to the Federal Government "to establish post-offices and post-roads."

Mr. DOUGLAS. The language of the Constitution is to "establish" post-roads, and that has been held to be a very different thing from building them.

Mr. WILLIAMS. That question was discussed in the Third Congress and was decided in favor of the construction of the Cumberland road by some of the very men who wrote the Constitution.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The contention that is made to-day by the leaders of the Republican party that the Government of the United States has no constitutional power to aid the States in building good roads was certainly not maintained by the leading men of the nation during the first half century of our existence as a Government.

In 1813, in a letter to J. W. Eppes, Jefferson made this most significant declaration:

> The fondest wish of my heart ever was that the surplus portion of these taxes, destined for the payment of that (Revolutionary) debt, should, when that object was accomplished, be continued by annual or biennial reenactments and applied in time of peace to the improvement of our country by canals, roads, and useful institutions (literary or others), and in time of war to the maintenance of the war.

In one of his later messages to Congress President Madison said:

> I particularly invite again the attention of Congress to the expediency of exercising their existing powers, and, where necessary, of resorting to the prescribed mode of enlarging them, in order to effectuate a comprehensive system of roads and canals, such as will have the effect of drawing more closely together every part of our country, by promoting intercourse and improvements, and by increasing the share of every part in the common stock of national prosperity.

Henry Clay was always an advocate of internal improvements and was in his generation the boldest and most persistent advocate of the building of national roads. His well-matured opinion on the question of internal improvements was most tersely expressed in a speech made in Congress in 1818, in which he said:

> Of all the modes in which a government can employ its surplus revenue none is more permanently beneficial than that of internal improvement. Fixed to the soil, it becomes a durable part of the land itself, diffusing comfort and activity and animation on all sides. The first direct effect is on the agricultural community, into whose pockets comes the difference in the expense of transportation between good and bad ways. Thus if the price of transporting a barrel of flour by the erection of the Cumberland turnpike should be lessened $2, the producer of the article would receive that $2 more now than formerly.

Let us leave to the opponents of good-road building the struggle to find constitutional warrant for their opposition, and let us examine the question from a material and practical standpoint.

The total mileage of roads in the United States is about 2,150,000, and only about 150,000 miles of this total had been improved by macadam, gravel, sand clay, or other special treatment at the close of 1904, or about 7½ per cent; second, that the expenditure in money and labor in 1904 was, approximately, $80,000,000. The Daily Consular Report of October 25, 1907, describes the French roadway system and calls attention to the fact that there are in France 23,656 miles of national road, which cost $303,975,000, and 316,898 miles of local highways, built at a total cost of $308,800,000. It will thus be seen that the French road system, unquestionably the most superb system of roads in the world, has cost a total of $612,775,000. By a comparative analysis of the conditions shown in this country and the French roadway system, you readily see what this great Republic of Europe is doing for her people as compared with the work in the United States, none of which is being done by the Federal Government—more shame to the Republican party.

It may interest you to know that the average freight rate by rail for 1906 was $0.00766 per ton mile. Investigations conducted by the Office of Public Roads, Agricultural Department, by the Maryland State geological survey, and by other investigators have established with reasonable accuracy that the average cost of hauling over wagon roads in this country is 25 cents per ton mile. The mean ocean freight rate on wheat, corn, and rye from New York to Liverpool, a distance of 3,100 miles, was in 1906 $1.006 per ton, or $0.0003 per ton per mile.

From a bulletin issued by the Agricultural Department on the "Costs of hauling crops from the farm to shipping points," I ascertained these facts:

Wheat crop, crop year 1905–6.

Total tonnage marketed	12, 123, 000
Average weight of load—pounds	3, 323
Total number of loads hauled	7, 296, 418
Average length of haul—miles	9. 4
Total mileage of roads hauled over	68, 586, 329
Average cost of hauling per ton per mile—cents	19
Total cost of marketing crop by wagon	$21, 651, 678
Average cost over hard roads per ton per mile—cents	10
Saving due to hard roads, when built	$10, 256, 058

Corn crop, crop year 1905–6.

Total tonnage marketed	19, 083, 000
Average weight of load—pounds	2, 696
Total number of loads hauled	14, 156, 528
Average length of haul—miles	7. 4
Total mileage of roads hauled over	104, 758, 307
Average cost of hauling per ton per mile—cents	19
Total cost of marketing crop by wagon	$26, 830, 698
Average cost over hard roads per ton per mile—cents	10
Saving due to hard roads, when built	$12, 709, 278

Cotton crop, crop year 1905–6.

Total tonnage marketed	2, 530, 000
Average weight of load—pounds	1, 702
Total number of loads hauled	2, 973, 560
Average length of haul—miles	11. 8
Total mileage of roads hauled over	35, 088, 008
Average cost of hauling per ton per mile—cents	27
Total cost of marketing crop by wagon	$8, 062, 173
Average cost over hard roads per ton per mile—cents	10
Saving due to hard roads, when built	$5, 076, 183

Although ocean rates were higher than usual during the years 1905–6, the mean charge for carrying wheat by regular steamship lines to Liverpool from New York, 3,100 miles, was only 3.8 cents per bushel, or 1.6 cents less than it cost the farmer to haul wheat 9.4 miles from his farm to a neighboring railroad station. In view of the important relationship existing between the railroad and the wagon road, it may be of interest to know the fact that the total mileage of railroads in 1905 was 218,101, the capitalization $13,805,258,121, and the operating expenses $1,390,602,152.

A. T. Byrne, in his 1907 edition of "Highway Construction," gives the cost of transportation on various road surfaces as 8 cents per ton mile on broken-stone roads, dry and in good order; 11.9 cents on broken-stone roads in ordinary condition; 39 cents on earth roads containing ruts and mud; 32.6 cents on sandy roads when wet; 64 cents on sandy roads when dry. Consider the enormous saving to the farmer that comes with the good roads and the great tax he pays for bad roads.

I have found in my study of the development of road administration, that in England administration began with the smallest unit, namely, the parish. This system originated by an act of Parliament passed in 1555, which provided for the election of surveyors of roads for each parish and for the working of the roads by compulsory labor. The statute labor succeeded compulsory labor. The parish was found to be too small as an administrative unit. A history of highways appearing in the Edinburgh Review in January and April, 1864, contains this statement:

From the days of Elizabeth the inconveniences resulting from the maintenance of highways by single parishes have been constantly apparent, and accordingly successive governments, without distinction of politics, Peelite, Whig, Conservative, and Coalition, made the attempt to combine parishes into highway districts and to transfer the superintendence of their roads to boards, employing the services of professional surveyors.

The trend of road administration continued away from localization, and subsequent to the formation of road districts it was provided that one-half of the expense of maintaining the roads should be borne by the county, and finally, in 1882, Parliament provided that one-half of the expense of county authorities should be refunded by parliamentary grant. In 1888 a further step away from localization was made, when the county was constituted the administrative unit in place of the district. The English people are known for their extreme conservatism, but it is significant to note that during a period of nearly three hundred and fifty years the trend has been constantly toward centralization of authority and administration of road affairs, and an apportionment of cost among all the units of government, from the lowest to the highest.

Statute labor, a prominent feature of most of our road systems, was abolished in England in the reign of William IV. Toll roads, which are found in many of our States, were abolished in England, Scotland, and Ireland about thirty years ago. It is a well-known fact that the American colonies adopted English laws and English precedents. As far back as 1657 the general assembly of Virginia empowered the county courts to appoint a surveyor of highways, and directed that respect must be had to the course followed in England. It is a fact worthy of note that, although Americans are considered an essentially progressive people and the English an extremely conservative people, America has clung to the old precedents and systems which England has abandoned.

I do not desire you to gather the impression from what I have said that I indorse the English system. As a matter of fact, it still lacks compactness; but the point I wish to make is that the tendency has been away from localization and the use of statute labor, and must be toward Government aid if we hope to succeed.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SCOTT. I make the point of order against the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Public roads: To enable the Secretary of Agriculture to make inquiries in regard to systems of road management throughout the United States; to furnish expert advice on road building, maintenance, and administration; to make investigations in regard to the best methods of road making, and the best kinds of road-making materials in the several States; to investigate the chemical and physical character of road materials; for the employment of local and special agents, clerks, assistants, and other labor required in the city of Washington and elsewhere; for collating, digesting, reporting, and illustrating the results of such investigations and experiments; for preparing, publishing, and distributing bulletins and reports; for rent and repairs of buildings in the District of Columbia, not to exceed $2,000; for necessary office fixtures and supplies, apparatus, and materials; telegraph and telephone service, official traveling and other necessary expenses, and to enable him to assist the agricultural colleges and experiment stations in disseminating information on this subject, $75,000: Provided, That no part of this appropriation shall be expended for the rent or purchase of road-making machinery.

Total for Office of Public Roads, $87,390.

Mr. SULZER. I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I desire to reserve a point of order.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment to this paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. CRAWFORD] offers an amendment, which will be considered as pending.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by striking out all after the word "dollars," in line 11, down to and including the word "machinery," in line 13, page 44.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina will suspend. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER] reserves a point of order on the paragraph.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise? The gentleman from Indiana has the floor on the point of order.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I understand the gentleman from Indiana has reserved the point of order.

Mr. SULZER. I should like to be heard on this.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I want to point out my reasons for believing that the point of order is good.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to have those reasons pointed out.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Did not the gentleman from Indiana simply reserve the point of order?

The CHAIRMAN. That is for the gentleman from Indiana to say.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Now, which are you going to do?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I think on a reservation of a point of order no debate is in order excepting upon that.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. It has been done a thousand times here in the last two weeks. The gentleman from North Carolina wants five minutes to discuss his amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understood the gentleman from North Carolina desired to discuss the amendment when it was presented.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Certainly he does.

The CHAIRMAN. And the Clerk read the amendment by mistake. No amendment can be presented until the points of order to the paragraph or the bill itself are disposed of.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. CRAWFORD. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER] only reserved the point of order.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Is it not allowable, Mr. Chairman, to perfect the paragraph before the point of order can be raised?

The CHAIRMAN. No; the Chair holds that it is not.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman, I trust the gentleman from Indiana will reserve the point of order until the gentleman from North Carolina can be heard, and after that I want to be heard myself.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Chairman, I have no disposition to undertake to strike out or eliminate the entire provision on a point of order. It is likely that the public-roads movement on the part of the Federal Government is accomplishing some good. In the State of Indiana, in which I live, like the people of the State of New York, we have a sort of self-reliant spirit of State sovereignty. In the district which I have the honor to represent we have expended in the neighborhood of $2,000,000, money raised by local taxation, for the purpose of building country roads, and in many instances we have paid as much as $4,000 a mile for macadamizing public highways.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. COX of Indiana. The gentleman says that in his district they have spent $2,000,000 for improvements on the public highways. Is it not a fact that the gentleman's district would have accepted that much more from the Federal Government if there had been a statute empowering the Federal Government to give it to them?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. My judgment is that if the proposition was submitted to the voters of the Tenth District of Indiana, or to those of the district so well represented by my colleague, for the Federal Government to distribute its surplus or any considerable amount of money to be used among the States for road building, it would be defeated by an overwhelming majority. The people of the State of Indiana believe that public money ought to be expended by the taxpayers themselves, and money that comes from the Federal Government comes like manna from heaven, and there is not that high sense of vigilance in its expenditure that there is where the people pay money into the common treasury and vigilantly look after its expenditure. One dollar of local tax will do as much in road building as $2 given by the Federal Government.

Mr. NORRIS. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I will yield to the gentleman from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. I would like to suggest to my friend from Indiana, in answer to the question by his colleague, that if $2,000,000 had been given to his district and the same amount to every other Congressional district in this country it would have required the sum of $800,000,000 to go around.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Yes; and it would have been money belonging to the people, belonging to the districts. I do not see any economy or purpose in taking money out of the Federal Treasury and expending it for local use. The money in the Federal Treasury belongs to the people of the United States. Gentlemen talk about spending money for the support of the Army and Navy. Whose Army and Navy are they? Whose commerce is it that large sums of money are expended for in river and harbor improvements if it is not the commerce of the farmer? Are not the Army and the Navy to protect the Government that the farmers do so much to support and that is so necessary to their security. The expenditure of money for the Army and the Navy is an expenditure of money for Federal functions, but it is not a Federal function to expend money to improve the roads of the country. Mr. Chairman, my purpose was to point out the objection I had to this paragraph, and I will proceed to do that now.

The objection I make is to the words "maintenance and administration," line 21, page 43. Those words are new words in the bill. They were never carried in any other appropriation bill. In the first place, it is beyond, I think, the constitutional authority of Congress. It may be within the power of Congress to establish post-offices and post-roads and military roads. I presume under the military power we could improve every mile of highway in the United States under the claim that we were preparing the way for common defense, but the provision in this paragraph does not confine the appropriation to post or military roads; it covers public roads generally. The language I have pointed out broadens the power beyond that which existed before. It is new legislation, even from the standpoint of the appropriation bills, and I think is subject to the point of order. The whole paragraph is subject to a point of order, but I am not disposed to prevent the Agricultural Department from continuing the work it has been doing for several years past, but I am opposed to the enlargement of that work.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, the words "maintenance and administration," as the gentleman suggests, are new to this bill. I do not believe, however, that they involve new legislation. Reading the entire sentence, it is as follows:

To furnish expert advice on road building, maintenance, and administration.

The maintenance of roads and the administration of a system of roads is just as important in the long run as the building of roads, and if the Department under the law has authority to furnish advice on road building, it also has authority to furnish advice on the maintenance and administration of roads. I wish to say that it is along this line that some of the most valuable work of that office is now being done. Experts are sent, for example, to a county, and in conference with the officials of that county they work out a system of administration and maintenance for the roads of the county that is of a great deal of value and which the local authorities are not equipped to work out for themselves. A part of the work done by this office of good roads is to familiarize itself with road law in various parts of the country, with road systems that are in operation in various parts of the country, and in that way the men connected with this office become experts in the systems of maintenance and administration and are able to offer very valuable advice to local officials. I feel, therefore, that on the merits of this question the language ought to remain in the bill and also that it is entitled to remain, so far as the question of order is concerned.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would ask the chairman of the committee whether in his judgment the omission of those words from the paragraph would make any difference with the total in the appropriation.

Mr. SCOTT. I think not. Mr. Chairman, I think they were inserted purely to avoid any possible question with the Comptroller of the Treasury, and no sum was added to the appropriation with especial reference to the insertion of those words.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER] think that the words "maintenance and administration" relate to the maintenance and administration of roads under this bill, or to merely giving good advice on this subject?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I presume it would be construed to relate to public roads, to advise in relation to the maintenance and administration of public roads, however they may be built. The law heretofore has authorized the Department of Agriculture to furnish expert advice upon road building. That was the limit of its authority. This paragraph authorizes the Secretary to go beyond road building, to the question of maintenance and administration. Where, for instance, heretofore a road was to be constructed, the Department of Agriculture could furnish expert advice in relation to the method of construction, but the Department is authorized, under the provisions of this paragraph, to furnish expert advice upon the question of maintenance and administration, without regard to the question of road building. It clearly enlarges the power of the Secretary of Agriculture. There is no doubt about that.

Mr. MANN. Very likely; but does the gentleman think there ought to be any great objection if the Department has somebody who can give expert advice on road building for that same person to give expert advice upon administration and maintenance of the roads?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I think if the Department furnishes advice as to road building the local authorities certainly ought to look after the maintenance and administration of the roads after they are constructed.

Mr. MANN. That is the very purpose of the proposition, to make them look after the maintenance and give them expert advice in reference to it.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Well, to be frank with the gentleman, I am not enamored of any part of this proposition. I think it is a departure from the proper powers of the Federal Government, the whole business, and therefore I am opposed to extending the power any further than has been extended heretofore.

Mr. MANN. I think the gentleman will remember that a year ago I reserved and came very nearly making a point of order upon the whole paragraph, and, in my judgment, it probably was subject to a point of order.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I think it is now.

Mr. MANN. And I stated at that time that unless it could be justified within the year—and I think that was the sentiment of the House at the time—we would cease making this appropriation. But during the year I personally have given some attention to the work they have been doing, and have, for myself, concluded that while I do not believe in the General Government building roads, the advice they have been giving is of very great value to the township officials, and the county officials, and the State officials in reference to the character and material of road building, and in reference to the maintenance of roads and in reference to the administration which goes to the building of the roads.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Now, I want to say that I live in a community that is proverbial for its good roads, macadamized roads, roads that cost a good deal of money—and I think the district I have the honor to represent here is full of expert road builders. I do not believe they have had any advice from the Federal Government with respect to the construction or maintenance or administration of a single mile of road, and I believe we have road builders that are perhaps as expert and competent as any of the road builders in the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman let me instance one particular matter to him on this subject? The gentleman has large steel plants, blast furnaces, in his district, and will soon have the largest in the United States. An immense amount of blast-furnace slag is turned out. The steel companies do not know what to do with this immense quantity of slag.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. We have built miles of road with it in the district already, and we know what to do with it.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman has built a few miles of road with it, but even in the gentleman's district there are to-day great quantities of this slag which no one knows what to do with, and when Gary, Ind., is completed there will be millions of tons of it. This department is to-day engaged, in connection with a similar work being carried on in Germany, in investigating the use of this blast-furnace slag for roads, and if it shall be developed, and in my judgment it will be, that it is good road-building stuff, it will be worth millions of dollars to the gentleman's own district.

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, it being evident there is a good deal of discussion growing out of this paragraph, and as the hour is late, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. FOSTER, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 19158, the agricultural appropriation bill, and had directed him to report that it had come to no resolution thereon.

STEAMBOAT INSPECTORS.

Mr. FRYE. I report back favorably from the Committee on Commerce the bill (S. 6290) to amend section 4414 of the Revised Statutes of the United States with an amendment to the title, and I submit a report (No. 447) thereon. The bill explains itself. It simply provides for the appointment of inspectors at Honolulu, Hawaii, and at San Juan, P. R. It is absolutely necessary for the carrying out of the requirements of law. I ask for its present consideration.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be read for the information of the Senate.

Mr. TELLER. I was going to ask to have it read.

The Secretary read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 4414 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be amended by inserting in the first paragraph thereof, after the words "and Burlington, Vt.," and before the words "one inspector of hulls," the words "Honolulu, Hawaii, and San Juan, P. R.;" and that the said section be further amended by inserting in the fifth paragraph thereof, after the words "and Norfolk, Va.," and before the words "at the rate of $2,000," the words "Honolulu, Hawaii, and San Juan, P. R."

Mr. FRYE. The bill simply provides for the appointment at those two ports of local inspectors as they are required under the law.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It authorizes the Secretary of War to donate to The Old Guard, an independent military organization of Columbus, Ohio, whose membership is composed entirely of Union soldiers of the war of the rebellion, such number of obsolete Springfield rifles, caliber .45, bayonets and bayonet scabbards for same, not to exceed 100, which may not be needed in the service of that Department.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ADDRESS OF MR. JUSTICE HARLAN.

Mr. TELLER. On Tuesday I made some remarks in the Senate and I referred to and quoted from an address delivered by Mr. Justice Harlan, of the State of Kentucky, in the city of New York, a few weeks since. I ask that in submitting my remarks for printing I may be allowed to couple with it in the RECORD the speech of Mr. Justice Harlan. It is an admirable speech, historical in the beginning and legal and judicial in its termination. It is a speech I think everyone would like to read, and it ought to be preserved.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Colorado asks permission to incorporate as a part of his remarks in the RECORD the speech of Mr. Justice Harlan, to which reference is made by him. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

OFFICERS OF STEAM VESSELS.

Mr. NELSON. From the Committee on Commerce I report back favorably, with an amendment to the title, the bill (S. 6201) to amend section 4438 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, and I submit a report (No. 448) thereon. I ask for the present consideration of the bill.

The Secretary read the bill; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It proposes to amend section 4438 of the Revised Statutes of the United States by striking out, after the words "chief mate, engineer" and before the words "or pilot of any steamer," the words "in charge of the watch," so that the section, when so amended, shall read:

SEC. 4438. The boards of local inspectors shall license and classify the masters, chief mates, and second and third mates, if in charge of a watch, engineers, and pilots of all steam vessels, and the masters of sail vessels of over 700 gross tons, and all other vessels of over 100 gross tons carrying passengers for hire. It shall be unlawful to employ any person, or for any person to serve as a master, chief mate, engineer, or pilot of any steamer, or as master of any sail vessel of over 700 gross tons, or of any other vessel of over 100 gross tons carrying passengers for hire, who is not licensed by the inspectors; and anyone violating this section shall be liable to a penalty of $100 for each offense.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill to amend section 4438 of the Revised Statutes of the United States relating to the licensing of officers of steam vessels."

ROBERT DAVIS.

Mr. KEAN. From the Committee on Claims I report back favorably, without amendment, the bill (S. 6293) for the relief of Robert Davis, and I submit a report (No. 449) thereon. It is a brief bill; it involves only one hundred and sixty-odd dollars; the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE] is interested in it; and it might just as well be passed now. I ask for its consideration.

The Secretary read the bill; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It directs the proper accounting officers, in settling and adjusting the accounts of Robert Davis, first lieutenant, Second Regiment Field Artillery, United States Army, to credit him with $164.48, which amount of Government funds was stolen from his safe on or about the 6th of February, 1904, by his post quartermaster-sergeant while Lieutenant Davis was acting as quartermaster at Fort Banks, Mass.

Mr. CLAPP. Is there a report accompanying the bill?

Mr. KEAN. There is a report accompanying the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

DONATION OF CANNON TO WINCHESTER, VA.

Mr. FOSTER. From the Committee on Military Affairs, I report back favorably, without amendment, the bill (H. I call the attention of the junior Senator from Virginia to this report.

Mr. MARTIN. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill just reported by the Senator from Louisiana.

The Secretary read the bill, and there being no objection the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It directs the Secretary of War to furnish to the city of Winchester, Va., two brass or bronze condemned field pieces or cannon, with their carriages and with a suitable outfit of cannon balls, which may not be needed in the service, the same to be used at the old headquarters of Gen. George Washington, which are now owned by that city, and to be subject at all times to the order of the Secretary of War.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. From the Committee on Forest Reservations and the Protection of Game, I report back, with an amendment, the bill (S. 6441) granting to Percival Lowell certain land within the San Francisco Mountains National Forest, in the Territory of Arizona, for observatory purposes, and I submit a report (No. 450) thereon. I ask for the present consideration of the bill.

The Secretary read the bill, and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The amendment was, on page 1, line 3, after the name "Percival Lowell," to insert the words:

During his life and upon his death to such trustee, person, or corporation as may be designated in his will for the conduct of the Lowell Observatory.

So as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That there be, and hereby is, granted to Percival Lowell, during his life and upon his death to such trustee, person, or corporation as may be designated in his will for the conduct of the Lowell Observatory, section No. 17, in township No. 21 north, of range 7 east, of the Gila and Salt River base and meridian, the said tract of land being within the San Francisco Mountains National Forest, in the Territory of Arizona, for observatory purposes in connection with the Lowell Observatory: Provided, That in the event of the removal or abandonment of the said observatory or the use of said land by the grantee for other than observatory purposes the said land shall revert to the United States: Provided further, That the title to the merchantable timber thereon and the right to cut and remove the same in such manner as to preserve the herbage and undergrowth in their natural condition shall remain in the United States.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. In connection with the bill just passed, I desire to have printed in the RECORD a letter from the Chief Forester recommending the passage of the bill.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
FOREST SERVICE,
Washington, March 30, 1908.

Hon. FRANK B. BRANDEGEE, United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR: With reference to the bill (H. R. 18865) for the sale of certain lands near Flagstaff, Ariz., in the San Francisco Mountains National Forest, to Prof. Percival Lowell, when I wrote to you March 2 I had been given the impression that the tract did not support any large quantity of merchantable timber, but later information from the supervisor of that national forest indicates that the timber upon this tract is of considerable value.

The supervisor's telegram is as follows:

"Lowell observatory tract section 17, township 21 north, range 7 east, level mesa breaking south and west; elevation, 7,200; clayey loam soil; malapai outcrop occasional; fragments numerous. Total merchantable timber, 3,290,000 feet, worth $5 thousand, account accessibility mill. Examination by Drake. Letter.

"POOLER."

This fact has been reported to the President, who directs me to say that the grant should be conditioned upon the use of the tract for observatory purposes only, with a reversion to the United States if at any time it is used for other purposes, and, moreover, that the bill should reserve to the United States the power of disposing of the merchantable timber in such manner as to preserve the herbage and undergrowth in their natural condition.

I appreciate Professor Lowell's eminent scientific attainments, and believe that a grant so conditioned will accomplish the object he has in view, namely, the preservation of the herbage and undergrowth in their natural state, in order to maintain the atmospheric conditions necessary to astronomical observation.

I have written to Senator CRANE the substance of this letter.

Very sincerely, yours,

GIFFORD PINCHOT, Forester.

OSAGE INDIAN LANDS.

Mr. OWEN introduced a joint resolution (S. R. 76) relative to homestead designations, made and to be made, of members of the Osage Tribe of Indians, which was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. OWEN. I am authorized by the Committee on Indian Affairs to report back the joint resolution and ask for its consideration.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will be read for information.

Mr. TELLER. It should be read first.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary was ordered to read the joint resolution.

The Secretary read the joint resolution, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That homesteads of members of the Osage Tribe of Indians in Oklahoma may consist of land designated from any one or more of their first three allotment selections taken under the act of Congress approved June 28, 1906, entitled "An act for the division of the lands and funds of the Osage Indians in Oklahoma Territory, and for other purposes," the designation thereof to be subject to approval by the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. TELLER. I should like to know if the Committee on Indian Affairs examined the joint resolution and authorized its report.

Mr. OWEN. The joint resolution has been passed upon by the Committee on Indian Affairs. It is based upon a report from the Secretary of the Interior that requested its passage.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

There being no objection, the joint resolution was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HEYBURN. For information, I should like to know if the joint resolution provides that Congress shall regulate what constitutes a homestead within what is now a State.

Mr. OWEN. No, sir. The Osages have three separate allotments, and the joint resolution merely permits the Osage himself, with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, to designate out of one of the three allotments the homestead he desires to retain.

Mr. HEYBURN. I supposed that homesteads would be regulated and defined by the State, as in other States, and I was rather marveling that the United States Government should be legislating in regard to what should constitute a homestead in Oklahoma.

Mr. OWEN. The homestead referred to is the homestead under the Osage agreement, and not a homestead in the ordinary sense.

Mr. HEYBURN. Still it seems to me, if they are going to be a State, they had better be a State there and regulate their own homesteads.

Mr. ALDRICH. I ask that the joint resolution be again read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It will be again read at the request of the Senator from Rhode Island.

The Secretary again read the joint resolution.

Mr. ALDRICH. Does the joint resolution come regularly from a committee of the Senate?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It is reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PRINTING PAPER AND WOOD PULP.

Mr. OVERMAN. I introduce a joint resolution and ask for its present consideration.

The joint resolution (S. R. 77) to put printing paper and wood pulp on the free list was read the first time by its title and the second time at length, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That all printing paper suitable for or adapted to the printing of newspapers, periodicals, or books, and all wood, wood pulp, used in the manufacture of printing paper, when imported into the United States, shall be exempt from duty.

Mr. HEYBURN. Has the joint resolution been reported from a committee?

PUBLIC EDUCATION IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be read.

The Secretary proceeded to read the bill.

Mr. SMOOT. What bill is now under consideration?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Senate bill 4032, to establish the direction and control of public education in the District of Columbia.

Mr. SMOOT. I did not hear the motion put.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair put it distinctly to the Senate. The bill is before the Senate.

Mr. SMOOT. I should like to have the regular order of business. It is not yet 1 o'clock.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The pending bill is the regular order upon motion and by a vote of the Senate. The Secretary will resume the reading of the bill.

The reading of the bill was concluded.

The first amendment was, in section 1, on page 1, line 3, before the word "first," to strike out "April" and insert "July;" on page 2, line 1, after the word "secretary," to insert "and supervising principals;" and in line 3, before the word "first," to strike out "April" and insert "July;" so as to make the section read:

That on and after July 1, 1908, the direction and control of the public schools of the District of Columbia shall be, and are hereby, transferred from the board of education and vested in a director of education, who shall succeed to all the powers hitherto resident in said board of education and in certain officers of said board, to wit: Superintendent, assistant superintendent of white schools, assistant superintendent of colored schools, and secretary to the said board. The offices of said superintendent, assistant superintendents, and secretary, and supervising principals are hereby abolished, to take effect July 1, 1908.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 2, page 2, line 7, after the word "appointed," to insert "unless he shall be sooner removed by the Commissioner of Education," so as to make the section read:

SEC. 2. That the director of education shall be appointed by the Commissioner of Education of the United States for a term of four years, or until his successor shall be appointed, unless he shall be sooner removed by the Commissioner of Education. No person shall be eligible to the office of the director of education who shall not be a graduate of a college or university of recognized standing, have pursued not less than three years of graduate university work or the equivalent, and has held educational positions of superior direction and control for a period of ten years or the equivalent.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 3, on page 2, line 14, to strike out the following words at the beginning of the section: "That the offices of supervising principals are hereby abolished, to take effect July 1, 1908;" in line 16, to strike out "that date" and insert "July 1;" and in line 20, after the word "education," to insert:

One of whom shall be designated in writing by the director of education to perform, during his necessary absence or inability from any cause, the duties hereby imposed upon the said director of education, without extra compensation.

So as to make the section read:

SEC. 3. On and after July 1 the director of education shall appoint seven assistant directors, two of whom shall be colored, for terms not exceeding four years, who shall at all times be under the direction of the director of education, one of whom shall be designated in writing by the director of education to perform, during his necessary absence or inability from any cause, the duties hereby imposed upon the said director of education, without extra compensation. The director of education is empowered to dismiss such assistant directors as he may deem advisable for the good of the service. The director of education shall report annually to Congress upon the first Monday in December. The salary of the director of education shall be $6,000 annually. The salary of the assistant directors of education shall be $3,500 annually.

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. If there are no further amendments proposed, the bill will be reported to the Senate.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I desire to be heard on the bill.

Last year Congress passed a bill reorganizing the educational system of this District, and providing for a board of education. The pending bill proposes utterly to legislate out of existence the board of education here and to put the schools of the District of Columbia in the hands of one person, to be appointed by the Commissioner of Education.

If there is anything that the American people take an interest in it is the public schools, and all over this broad land in every city, big or small, the people themselves have an opportunity to say something about the management of their public schools. This is the first instance I know of or have heard of where it is attempted to entirely disfranchise the people of a large city and a large community such as the city of Washington. Why the people of the District of Columbia, with a population of nearly 400,000, should be utterly disfranchised and their schools put under the control of an autocrat passes my comprehension.

Who is to appoint this man and from where is he to come? There is no provision in the proposed law as to what place he may come from. The Commissioner of Education may appoint a man from Alaska, Hawaii, or from anywhere within the boundaries of the United States to come here and take charge of the schools of the District of Columbia.

Mr. SCOTT. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. NELSON. Certainly.

Mr. SCOTT. Do not some of our judges come from the States, and not from the District of Columbia, and yet their duties are entirely within the District?

Mr. NELSON. That is entirely different. What are the duties of the Commissioner of Education? The duties of that office are mainly statistical. The only educational business that he has any charge of is simply that through Doctor Jackson he has charge of the education of the natives of the district of Alaska.

I have heard it said, Mr. President, that the people of the District of Columbia ought to submit to this autocratic power because the Government pays half the expenses. Senators must remember that the Government made magnificent grants of land to the public schools of all the great States of the Union. The agricultural-college grant was given to all the States, and we increased the annual appropriation last year from $25,000 to $50,000 for the support of agricultural colleges, and we have given to all the public-land States a grant of two sections in every township for public schools. We have given the States and Territories all this assistance to carry on their public schools, and yet we have never undertaken, not even in any of the Territories, to divest the people of the power of managing their schools.

The people of this District, Mr. President, are sufficiently disfranchised to-day. Their government is in the hands of three Commissioners, and they have to come to Congress for every bit of legislation, a good deal of which is such as is enacted by the common councils of municipal corporations.

Now, to take the last vestige of self-government out of the hands of the people here, especially in a matter that is so near and dear to the American people as the public schools, seems to me to surpass all comprehension and to be a great outrage on the people of Washington. I do not know and I can not conceive what wrongs the people of Washington have perpetrated that they should be penalized in this manner.

The Committee on the District of Columbia reported a bill last year to reorganize the schools. We were then given to understand that if that law were passed we would have a good system of schools. It provided for the appointment of a board of education consisting of nine members, in which all sides were represented and participated.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

Mr. NELSON. Unfortunately a superintendent was selected for the head of the schools of the District of Columbia who in some manner kept in hot water during the entire year——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. NELSON. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator, of course, desires to be accurate. That is his purpose always. The Senator says the bill of last year provided for the appointment of a board of education. For a great many years there has been a board of education here. That was not a new provision.

Mr. NELSON. I know. Always since they organized their system of schools here they have had a board of education.

Mr. GALLINGER. And that board has been in a row pretty nearly every day since it was appointed.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, when this bill was pending before the committee representative bodies of teachers and of other public organizations here desired to be heard before the committee. A committee of the chamber of commerce of this city attended and desired to be heard, and they were refused a hearing. Scarcely anybody was heard in regard to this bill. I have here a statement containing the objections of the Washington Chamber of Commerce to the passage of this bill, which I ask may be read at the Secretary's desk for the information of the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

OBJECTIONS TO THE DOLLIVER LAW.

1. LOCAL CONTROL.

The present school law provides for local control of our schools. The Dolliver bill contains no such provision, but under it the schools which the children of the people of this District must attend may be managed entirely by nonresidents. The citizens of the District are taxed to support the schools, but under the Dolliver bill they are not assured of any voice in regard to them.

2. AUTOCRATIC POWER.

The Dolliver bill abolishes the board of education, secretary of the board, the superintendent, assistant superintendents, and the supervising principals, and vests an autocratic control of the schools in a director of education to be appointed by a Federal officer, the Commissioner of Education, responsible in no way to the people of this District.

3. ONE-MAN POWER UNCHECKED.

The Dolliver bill, after providing for the appointment of a director of education, authorizes said director to appoint seven assistant directors, any or all of whom he may remove summarily at his discretion. No educational qualifications are prescribed for these assistant directors, and they are necessarily entirely subservient to the director.

4. PRESENT LAW.

The Dolliver bill nullifies or makes easy the nullification of all the good features of the present law, which features were put into the present law to guarantee justice and fairness in regard to appointment, promotion, and dismissal of officials and teachers. The Dolliver bill places no check on the director of education in the direction of the disbursement of school funds.

5. IDEAL MAN.

The Dolliver bill requires an ideal man in all moods and at all times, and it is folly to expect to secure such a man. In whatever measure he may have bad qualities, the opportunity for him to do harm is unlimited and unchecked so long as he is solid with the appointing power.

6. POLITICAL DISTURBANCE.

The Dolliver bill provides a system of school administration that is peculiarly liable to be dominated and controlled by political and other powerful influences. Under the unchecked control of a director of education, dependent for continued tenure in office on a dependent Federal appointing power, the schools will be continually in danger of having pressure successfully applied to introduce into them incompetent if not otherwise undesirable teachers. The citizens of the District having no assurance of a voice in school matters, local public sentiment will be ineffective or utterly unavailing to prevent or correct any evils which may arise.

7. SUPERVISION.

The Dolliver bill destroys entirely the present supervision of the 1,100 graded school classes and the 1,100 teachers of those classes.

(a) The principals of the school buildings are themselves teachers, and could not possibly exercise the necessary supervision and preserve uniformity in the system.

(b) The seven assistant directors could not possibly perform these supervising duties, as they, in connection with and under control of the director, will be charged with all the duties of the two assistant superintendents as well as all the business affairs of the schools.

8. TESTIMONY FROM THE SCHOOLS.

With practical unanimity the school officers and teachers testify that the present law is an admirable one, and none of them has suggested or advised changes to the committee, except in comparatively unimportant details which may be made by minor amendments. The few who have suggested any changes are opposed to asking that they be made at present, for fear of a change in the general features of the law which are absolutely satisfactory. The present law is scientifically framed and provides admirably for efficient administration, and proper protection for the teachers and the public interests.

9. TEACHERS—HEARING.

The teachers of the city are thoroughly alarmed at the prospect of the enactment of the Dolliver bill, which was reported favorably to the Senate without a hearing to the teachers or school officials or citizens of this District, save a few who were favorable to the bill. The Washington Chamber of Commerce, through its public school committee, requested a hearing before the Senate District Committee, but the request was not granted.

10. PEACE AND QUIET.

A reasonable discussion of school affairs will take place in any community, and only good results from it. That some little excitement might arise from certain exigencies occasionally to be dealt with in school matters affords no justification for taking away the rights of the people to a local and representative control, and entirely depriving them of any voice in school matters by fastening upon them an autocratic system of control in which they can have no say.

The exigencies which gave rise to the trial of the late superintendent caused an agitation and discussion which has been magnified by a few enemies of the present school system and made the basis of a charge that factions which do not exist have been created in the schools. The people generally approve the result that has been brought about by their representative body, the board of education of the District of Columbia, and it is not too much to say that practically complete harmony will prevail in school affairs in the District of Columbia, and that the best class of educational work is possible if the present law is not disturbed.

Peace and quiet obtained under an imperial and autocratic control will be obtained at the expense of justice and fairness, and by creating a condition of helplessness, except for a few possessing influence. A short duration of such autocratic control would probably result in introducing more harm into the schools of the District of Columbia than could be eradicated in many years. That there is no demand except upon the part of a very few people for any such change in our school laws as that proposed by the Dolliver bill, and that there is no necessity for it, could, it is believed, be readily established at a hearing.

So far as the committee has been able to discover, there is no community in the United States where the autocratic control of public schools is vested in a single man, or where the control of the schools is divorced from the voice of the people locally concerned. It is quite certain that the Dolliver bill is out of all harmony with the laws under which the public schools of this country are administered.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I do not want to take up the time of the Senate needlessly in the discussion of this bill. It seems to me that it is very apparent that it would be a great outrage on the people of Washington to deprive them of those privileges in connection with educational affairs that are accorded to the citizens of every other municipality and town in this country. In view of that fact, I move to recommit the bill to the committee that reported it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Minnesota moves to recommit the pending bill to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. BURKETT. Mr. President, I want to ask the Senate to give me two or three minutes——

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. BURKETT. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator will permit me just one word, I will say that I listened with some attention to the document that was read from the desk, which is a report of the committee on public schools of the Washington Chamber of Commerce. I simply want to say in that connection that the chairman of the board of education is the president of the Washington Chamber of Commerce, and if that gentleman is to be discussed, there will be some things said about his management of the schools here that may be interesting.

Mr. BURKETT. Mr. President, I want to ask the Senate to give me, in the few minutes that I shall talk, close attention, and I will try to make plain what this bill is to do and why we have reported it.

I wish to say in the beginning that no Senator who has not served on the District of Columbia Committee can realize all the troubles that come to a Senator who serves on that committee. There is nothing more aggravating and more trying than the problems of any municipality, and I undertake to say that there is not anything in all municipal affairs that is so tender and that needs so much care and so much consideration as the school part of municipal affairs. I wish also to remind the Senate that the Committee on the District of Columbia was put in charge of this legislation by a vote of the Senate. When we came to Washington last fall the District of Columbia was in a jumble, a turmoil—I used the word "jumble" because that was the condition, but the Senator to my right suggests "turmoil" as better—with reference to our schools.

There was complaint everywhere that our school system and our school management were wrong. The school superintendent had not been able to do what it was thought a school superintendent ought to be able to do; the school board had not been able to do what the idea of the people suggested that school boards ought to do. Every member of the Senate and of the House of Representatives was besieged by teachers, by citizens, and by officers of the board to do something to straighten out this school trouble. A resolution was introduced asking the District of Columbia Committee to give some special attention to the then existing condition of the school board. A subcommittee of that District Committee was appointed, and to that subcommittee was referred that resolution.

I had the honor of being chairman of that subcommittee to which was referred the resolution. There were four other members of that subcommittee, as careful and painstaking and competent men as there are on the floor of the Senate. They gave to this matter as much care, as much consideration, and as much concern as I have ever seen given to any subject in this body or in any other legislative body in which I have ever served.

About the time we were beginning that consideration, what is known as the "Dolliver bill" was introduced in the Senate. That bill was referred to the subcommittee. After some amendments were adopted—there are one or two other amendments still to be made before the bill should be passed—the subcommittee unanimously reported favorably on the passage of this bill.

The bill was taken before the District Committee, and a practically full attendance, I may say, was present of members of the committee that morning. The bill was explained at length. Practically the entire morning was taken up at the hearing of the report of the subcommittee on the bill. That committee unanimously, with one exception, favored reporting the bill, and that one exception——

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Mr. President——

Mr. BURKETT. Just let me finish, please. That one exception was to only a portion of the bill. So the bill comes before the Senate with that indorsement.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Vermont?

Mr. BURKETT. Certainly.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Do I understand the Senator from Nebraska to say that there was a full committee when this bill was considered?

Mr. BURKETT. I said "practically a full committee." I did not say "full," because I suppose there may have been one or two absent.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I was detained from that meeting of the committee by illness.

Mr. BURKETT. I took particular pains to say "practically a full committee." I say it was an unusually full committee.

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. BURKETT. I do.

Mr. HOPKINS. The Senator from Nebraska in his remarks referred to a hearing before the subcommittee. I should like to know what educators appeared before the subcommittee, and what was the nature of the objection to the existing law that was advocated by the different parties who came before the subcommittee that led to the adoption of the bill that is now proposed.

Mr. BURKETT. I will say——

Mr. FLINT. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. BURKETT. Yes.

Mr. FLINT. I would like to ask the Senator from Nebraska, in further discussion of the subject brought out by the Senator from Illinois, whether he will state to us whether in this hearing it was shown that there was any combination in the present board of education?

Mr. HOPKINS. We can not hear the Senator from California.

Mr. FLINT. I asked the Senator from Nebraska, when he was discussing the question called out by the question of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. HOPKINS], if he would state whether or not the hearing before this committee satisfied him and the other members of the committee that there was any combination among the members of the board of education of this city, so that certain members of the board were acting in harmony in connection with all the legislation and ignoring practically other members of the board.

Mr. BURKETT. Mr. President, I would rather not be asked to answer that question directly. There have been so many charges and so much crimination and recrimination hurled back and forth between the members of the board, between teachers and other teachers, and between teachers and the board that some of it is scandalous.

I want to say, in reply to the Senator from Illinois [Mr. HOPKINS], that I hope he will not think that any member of that subcommittee was less honest in his endeavor, although he might have been less competent, than the Senator from Illinois, but that any member of that subcommittee was less honest and less earnest in the endeavor to try to bring about something in this school matter that would adjust it for us.

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. BURKETT. Certainly.

Mr. HOPKINS. The question I asked would not impugn either the honesty or the integrity or the ability of the subcommittee. My question was propounded to the Senator for the purpose of getting light upon this subject. This bill which is proposed by the committee is a complete revolution from existing conditions. The change, as stated by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON], is a remarkable one, and if the Senators upon this floor are asked to follow the committee, it seems to me that the Senator in charge of the bill should put us in possession of the facts, so that we can act as intelligently upon those facts as did the committee which reported the bill.

Mr. BURKETT. I will say, Mr. President, that the Senator who is talking has been endeavoring to take the bill along step by step, stating exactly what has been done. I have myself forgotten now what I was talking about when the Senator interrupted me with his question.

Mr. NELSON. Will the Senator yield for a question?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. BURKETT. Certainly, for a question.

Mr. NELSON. I have here a copy of the printed hearing on this bill before the committee, and it seems that no one appeared before the committee to make any statement except an old retired rear-admiral, who had been appointed on the board and who had become disgruntled in the early stages of the proceedings and had resigned. Was anybody else, outside of the members of the committee and this rear-admiral, heard by the subcommittee?

Mr. BURKETT. I will say to the Senator from Minnesota that a whole lot of us will do well if we will bear our years and our reputations as well as that distinguished "old disgruntled rear-admiral" to whom the Senator has referred.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. BURKETT. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator will permit me to inject a suggestion, the committee room was filled with people, who might have been heard had they asked for a hearing.

Mr. BURKETT. We took the matter up, and I will say the committee did not lack for information. I want to say to the Senate just what this bill does. There are just two things that this bill does, and I can show to the Senate in a moment why it was that the school board were absolutely incompetent witnesses at this sort of a hearing.

The bill does two things. It abolishes the school board of the District of Columbia and discharges thirteen supervising principals. The Senator from Minnesota talks about the school reorganization and about the bill that was passed two years ago. I want in passing just to throw in this suggestion.

Mr. CLAY. With the Senator's permission——

Mr. BURKETT. Please let me get through, and then the Senator may proceed.

At the time the school bill was passed two years ago, I stood on this floor and said to the Senate that it was not a perfect bill; that those thirteen supervising principals should be abolished; that there was not another school system in the United States that had that sort of an organization, and that every educator that had ever been permitted to testify or to give attention to the matter said that Washingon never could have a good school system until those thirteen supervising principals were abolished. We realized when we undertook to abolish them in the bill two years ago that those thirteen supervising principals reached out and had their fingers on 1,300 teachers in the District of Columbia.

Every teacher in the graded schools in the District of Columbia has his or her efficiency record marked up or down by those thirteen supervising principals, and when any legislation was proposed to abolish those thirteen supervising principals, they at once had their fingers on 1,300 teachers in the District of Columbia, who, in turn, ramified throughout the District and commanded a wonderful influence. We realized that, involved as that bill for the reorganization of these schools was, extensive as it was in its limits and in its functions, it had all the troubles it could bear without throwing into it or injecting into it the personal fight of these thirteen supervising principals, who ramified throughout the entire District in a personal way.

The Senate will remember that we had to stand up on this floor and assure the Senate and assure the people of the District of Columbia and the teachers that no teacher should be thrown out of his or her job at that time. Why? Because we realized that to get that reorganization bill through we had to assure the teachers that none of them would lose their jobs, so as to prevent them from organizing a propaganda against the bill.

Now, let me say that every person, every board of trade, every newspaper, and school-teacher, everyone opposing this legislation now opposed that legislation two years ago. Every one of them, without a single exception, is here testifying to the wisdom of that legislation of two years ago and condemning this additional legislation now. If I had the time, I could tell the Senate why that is.

Mr. HOPKINS. Right there, does the Senator mean to say that the two years' experience that the teachers and those interested in the schools have had has shown them that they were in error two years ago and that the supervising principals are beneficial to the educational system?

Mr. BURKETT. I did not say anything of the kind to the Senator. I am willing to have him ask any question for information, but I do not want any catch questions here. I have no personal concern in this. I am willing to answer any question, but I do not want to be bothered here with catch questions.

Mr. CLAY and Mr. HOPKINS addressed the Chair.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield?

Mr. BURKETT. I yield to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. HOPKINS. I disclaim any idea of "catch questions." I simply took the statement of the Senator from Nebraska, who said that when the bill was before Congress two years ago there were objections to the supervising principals, but that the very parties who had had the experience of two years with them now come and protest against abolishing them.

Mr. GALLINGER. No; they do not.

Mr. BURKETT. If I created that impression on the Senator, I will correct it. I did not suppose I had created that impression on anyone.

Mr. HOPKINS. I simply took the language of the Senator.

Mr. BURKETT. I apologize to the Senator. If I created that impression on the Senator, I should like to correct it.

Mr. CLAY. Mr. President——

Mr. BURKETT. Let me answer the question. The committee two years ago, in considering the matter, in their judgment, thought they ought to abolish the thirteen supervising principals, but then it was merely broached or talked of, and they at once set about to defeat this reorganization bill and the committee dropped it at once.

I say that all the people who are against this bill to-day were against that bill two years ago. The newspapers fought that bill two years ago very actively, just as they are doing now. The board of trade and all these people fought that bill two years ago. I say all those people are now petitioning us to let things be as they are, and hence are all indorsing the bill of two years ago.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. BURKETT. Certainly.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I should like to make an inquiry of the Senator. He fears the result of having the action of thirteen hundred teachers influenced by thirteen supervising principals. Does he think that the danger would be lessened or the influence would be lessened if the thirteen were consolidated into one man? In other words, would it not be concentration of authority greater than he is willing now to extend to the present board?

Mr. BURKETT. I will say that the Senator from Wyoming misunderstands me if he thinks that that is the object of abolishing the thirteen supervising principals.

Mr. CLAY. Mr. President——

Mr. BURKETT. I said I would yield to the Senator from Georgia. I now yield to him.

Mr. CLAY. I want to call the Senator's attention to this bill. There are only two features in it.

Mr. BURKETT. Just two.

Mr. CLAY. The bill provides—

That on and after July 1, 1908, the direction and control of the public schools of the District of Columbia shall be, and are hereby, transferred from the board of education and vested in a director of education, who shall succeed to all the powers hitherto resident in said board of education and in certain officers of said board.

Now, again:

SEC. 3. On and after July 1 the director of education shall appoint seven assistant directors, two of whom shall be colored, for terms not exceeding four years, who shall at all times be under the direction of the director of education.

I want to ask the Senator this question: Will not this bill, if it becomes a law, place the educational affairs of the District of Columbia absolutely and unconditionally in the hands of one man? He can dismiss teachers, and the assistant directors must act as he says. They are his directors and also subject to his orders. Is it not true that the members of the board of education of the District of Columbia ought to be citizens of the District of Columbia, selected from the very best people of this District? And ought not the board of education of a great city like this really control, and practically ought not the schools be subject to their orders? If we pass this bill, we absolutely place in the hands of one director the control and management of the schools of the city of Washington.

Mr. BURKETT. Now, Mr. President, I will say to the Senator that that is the object of the bill. I do not want to disguise anything. It is to get rid of a school board that has been troubling us ever since we have had a District of Columbia. Let me say to the Senate now, with reference to that, that matters could not be much worse. In the last ten years we have had four different school boards in the District of Columbia, and we have had forty-two different members of the school boards in the District of Columbia in the last ten years. That is the condition. That is a practical result of the system. It is all right to talk about getting citizens of the District of Columbia to serve on the school board, but you can not get the citizens of the District of Columbia to serve on the school board or to stay on the school board—that is, those who would seem to be the most desirable to be members of the school board. For instance, a very prominent member——

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President——

Mr. BURKETT. Just let me finish. A very prominent citizen of the District of Columbia came to me. He had been a member of the school board, and he said, "Senator, I think we ought to have control over things of a local nature." I said,

"Certainly; so do I. Will you serve on the school board? Why did you not serve when you were appointed two or three years ago?" That same man was appointed to the school board because he was a very distinguished man, and just such a man as we ought to have on the school board; but he served four months and resigned. The president of one of our great educational institutions here came to me and said, "I think we ought to have a voice in the school board." "Very well," I said; "why did you not stay on the school board when you were appointed two years ago, under the present law?" So in the last nine years we have had four complete changes in the school board, including forty-two members of the body in that time. Under those conditions it is not possible, I submit, to have a school-board system or any other kind of a system to get good results.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. BURKETT. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The school board to which the Senator refers performs a labor of love, does it not? Its members do not get any compensation?

Mr. BURKETT. No.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. What would the Senator say if an amendment were proposed in line 9, page 2, after the word "not," so that the section would read:

No person shall be eligible to the office of director of education who shall not have been an actual bona fide resident of the District of Columbia for five years previous thereto.

I will say——

Mr. BURKETT. Mr. President——

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Before the Senator answers, if he will permit me, I will say that my amendment places a citizen of Washington with direct authority in charge of these schools.

Mr. BURKETT. May I ask the Senator a question? Does he know of any resident of the District of Columbia who has the qualifications that a director of schools is required to have under this bill?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I think the people of the city of Washington are as competent to deal with their school affairs and with governmental affairs as the people of any city in the country, and I say that the bill is a very unfair discrimination against the people of this city whose children attend the public schools.

Mr. BURKETT. Now, Mr. President, I want to continue along at least until I get my statement in some sort of connected shape.

That is one of the objections that was raised here. The Senator from Minnesota said we might go to California or to Arkansas or to some place else and get a superintendent. Let me say to the Senator that when the people up in Milwaukee wanted a superintendent, they went down into Nebraska and got a superintendent. There is not any place in this country where it is contended that you should take your superintendent of schools from the local town or State. Such a proposition never was suggested.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, if the Senator——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield further to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. BURKETT. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The Senator did not understand me to refer to the superintendent. I was directing my amendment and the observation to the director of education and not to the superintendents.

Mr. BURKETT. Well, I will say to the Senator that he has not read the bill carefully, or he would see that the director is the real superintendent.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I do not so read it, and I have read the bill very carefully.

Mr. BURKETT. The Senator should read it over again, and he will see.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. BURKETT. Certainly.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I want to ask a question of the Senator for information. He has spent a great deal of time, trouble, and study, I know, upon this school situation. I want to ask him if, in the investigation of the situation here, he has found it to be a fact that any other city of the United States controls its school affairs along the lines indicated in this bill?

Mr. BURKETT. I will say that the system in Buffalo is very similar to this. I will also say in reply to the Senator, that of course he understands there is no other place in this country where the people do not have a vote.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I understand that.

Mr. BURKETT. If they had a vote here and the school board had to be responsible to the people, it would be a different proposition.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. What I wanted to get at was whether or not the committee, in their consideration of this proposition, knew of any precedents where such a system had worked out well or ill.

Mr. BURKETT. They have got practically the one-man power, as I say, up in Buffalo.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator will permit me, I will say that neither is there any other city where the Government is an equal partner in the matter of paying taxes. I will add, if the Senator will permit me further, the contention that this matter should be left in the hands of the people of the District of Columbia is not very convincing when we recall the fact that the court of appeals of the District of Columbia is composed of a judge from Texas, a judge from Vermont, and a judge from Wyoming, I think, and that the postmaster of the city of Washington, I believe, is a citizen of the State of New York.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. He is a citizen of the District of Columbia, as the Senator will see if he will examine the record.

Mr. GALLINGER. I recall the fact that a very vigorous fight was made against him on the ground that he was not a citizen of the District of Columbia at the time of his appointment, and he was not a citizen of Washington at that time.

Mr. BURKETT. Now, Mr. President, I want to go back, and I will ask that I be permitted to continue this statement until I get it in a somewhat connected form.

This bill does two things. It puts the management of the schools into the hands of a director of education, or superintendent, which is the same thing, with just a change of name, and it abolishes the thirteen supervising principals.

Now, let me call attention to the fact that I have here a verbatim copy of all the records of the school board for the last year. I have taken occasion to go through them, and there is not anything in them except educational matter. The Senate should remember that Congress appropriates every dollar for the schools of the District of Columbia. The school board does not have anything to do with the expenditure of the money or the appropriating of money. Congress appropriates specifically every dollar of money that is used.

As the Senate will remember, in the appropriation bill each year the salary of every teacher is appropriated for specifically; the salary of the principal of every school is appropriated for specifically; and if there is to be a school building erected, Congress appropriates for that building so much money, provides where it shall be located, and so forth, specifically. The money is paid out under the direction of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia. When schoolbooks are bought, the Commissioners of the District of Columbia distribute the money for that purpose. So the school board have never had any function of a fiscal nature in connection with the schools.

There is only the other side, and that is the educational side of the school system, and the superintendent of schools attends to that.

The board of education, without anything of a financial or fiscal nature to do, has used its time interfering—I do not say that in a harsh way—but it has interfered with the educational part of the work, the part that belongs to the superintendent of schools, and, as a result, there have been constant broils in the schools. There has never been a time in the ten years that I have been in Congress that we have not had constant broils and constant turmoil in the school; and, in my opinion, there never will be such a time so long as we have a board of education with no duties to perform except the duties that belong strictly to the superintendent of education. If the Senators will look through this record, they will find that practically all that this board of education has ever done was to designate, for instance, a teacher to go from the Force School to the Adams School, or to send this teacher to that school, or something of that nature that a superintendent of education ought to do unlet and unhindered. There has been nothing for the board of education to do.

Now, I will call the attention of the Senate to the fact that the recent trouble, which raised the disturbance that we had when we came down here last fall, was due to a difference of opinion as to when German should begin to be taught in the public schools. It seems that the superintendent of education thought it ought to be begun to be taught at the seventh grade, I believe. Some members of the school board thought it ought not to be begun until the twelfth grade or the tenth grade, and they got into trouble over when German should begin to be taught in the public schools. That difficulty was magnified. One thing brought on another, until we had all the troubles which finally resulted in the discharging of the superintendent of schools. Perhaps he had committed crimes enough to warrant his discharge. I am not saying anything about that, because I do not know anything about it, and I will say that I do not care anything about it; but the whole thing started over the question as to when German should begin to be taught in the public schools. The trouble was largely between the superintendent of schools, an educator, and a business man down here on Pennsylvania avenue thinking that he knew more about when German should be started than did this professional educator. It is because of the conflict of authority between the board of education and the superintendent of schools that this turmoil has been kept constantly going on.

Now, let me call attention to another thing. If the Senators have read last evening's papers or this morning's papers, they will see that a great controversy is going on now between the Commissioners of the District of Columbia and the board of education. Ever since the great schoolhouse fire out in Ohio all over this country the people have been looking after fire escapes on school buildings, and if you have read the papers and read of the controversies you will see that there is an absolute deadlock in the District of Columbia to-day between the District of Columbia Commissioners and the board of education on this question of fire escapes. Only the other day I talked with the building inspector about it, and absolutely there is nothing to be done because of the fussing and quarreling between the one having authority and the other having directory power, the one having directory power refusing to do anything because it does not have authority, and the one who has authority having nobody to enforce its decrees. So the board of education comes in as a sort of fifth wheel between the Commissioners of the District of Columbia on the one side, who have all the fiscal end of the District affairs to attend to, and the director of education on the other side, who has the educational system and the direction of schools in hand. So they are not of consequence; they are not necessary.

The Senator asks if there is any other town that compares with this. There is not any other town in the country that has a board of commissioners like the District of Columbia has, given by law, with certain duties and certain authority and certain prerogatives. With reference to the school system that we have here in the District of Columbia, there is not another community that is just like this, and there never has been.

The committee realized that fact when they drew the former bill, two years ago. We did not want to take anything away from the District. We said, "Let us continue this school board." Some said, "What is the use of having a school board? What need is there for it? Why should we continue it?" We said that the trouble perhaps has been that the District Commissioners have been appointing this board of education. They have had trouble. Let us try somebody else. We thought of the President. We thought of pretty much everybody to appoint the board of education, and finally we said, "We will have the judges of the supreme court of the district of Columbia appoint the board of education, and perhaps we will get a board then that will not keep up this constant contest and these squabbles, one that will properly recognize its fair limitations, cut out all this trouble, and keep the schools out of the turmoil that they have been in." We did that thing. The result was that all the politics, all the fussing, all the social affairs, and everything in the District of Columbia, some way or other, centered in this board of education; and when they came to appoint the board of education the appointing power could not be free for a single moment. They were assaulted by all the cliques and factions, and all the politics and all the social affairs in the whole District were jammed onto them, and they were instructed how they should appoint the board of education and whom they should appoint.

The result was that when the board of education was appointed, upon them was visited all the politics, and so forth, in this District; and there has been one continual squabble ever since the day that this school board went into operation under that bill. In short, the same result, the same trouble, has attended every moment of the life of this school board that has attended every other school board that we have ever had in the District of Columbia.

Now they say: "Bring into the school board the men of the District of Columbia." Take the members of that board of trade, that has been so dreadfully exercised about how to handle District of Columbia affairs. The postmaster himself, is one of them, and he signed their statement and came up to see me personally about "taking the school management out of the hands of the dear people of the District of Columbia." I turned on him and said, as the Senator from New Hampshire has stated, "It was only about sixteen months ago that this same board of trade was up here protesting against your appointment because you were not a resident of the District of Columbia." The members of that board of trade are not, strictly speaking, actual residents of the District of Columbia as we are of our respective States. Half of them, perhaps, vote somewhere else or owe allegiance somewhere else or own property somewhere else, and they are citizens of somewhere else, as a matter of fact.

I want to speak with reference to these thirteen supervising principals. That is the thing that is causing the trouble. It is not the board of education. The Senate does not want to misunderstand the question and the real controversy here. There is not anybody much who cares about the board of education except the board of education.

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. BURKETT. Just let me finish what I am saying, and then I will yield. I want the Senate to understand that the president of the board of education, Mr. Oyster, is the president of this same commercial club. He is the man, and his particular friend appoints these committees. That is the result which comes out of it. Nobody else cares anything about the board of education. It is the thirteen supervising principals who have made all this talk. I am not blaming them. They are doing just what every other man who holds positions would do, and they are the persons who are making the arguments against the bill. Now I yield to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. HOPKINS. I was going to suggest that if there is no trouble with the board of education and if the only trouble that has occurred in the educational administration here in the city of Washington has been occasioned by the supervising principals, why did not the committee, instead of attempting legislation of the character proposed in the bill——

Mr. BURKETT. Mr. President, I refuse to yield longer.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Nebraska declines to yield further.

Mr. BURKETT. I will not be misinterpreted on the floor of the Senate under guise of asking a question any further. I did not make any such statement as that. There is no Senator here who will not bear me out in denying that I made such a statement.

Mr. HOPKINS. Did you not say that the trouble here was with the board——

Mr. BURKETT. I decline to yield.

Mr. HOPKINS. Did you not say the trouble was with the board of supervising principals?

Mr. LONG. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. BURKETT. Certainly.

Mr. LONG. The Senator early in his remarks said that there was one member of the Committee on the District of Columbia who objected to this bill.

Mr. BURKETT. Who was present there that day.

Mr. LONG. I was that member.

Mr. BURKETT. You were.

Mr. LONG. My objection was to that part of the bill which provided for the appointment of the director of education by the Commissioner of Education of the United States. In my opinion, that is a serious objection to the bill and was the reason why I opposed it in committee and why I shall vote against it in the Senate.

Mr. BURKETT. The Senator is entirely correct. He held that position before the committee. He thought, as I recollect, that the director of education should be appointed by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia.

I will say to the Senate that the committee made up its opinions for this reason: The appointments of the District Commissioners have not been in the past always successful. The District Commissioners are high-minded men, but I suppose they are susceptible to the same influences and the same forces that all people having appointive power are susceptible to, especially when they live in the immediate vicinity where the appointment has to be made. For instance, we remember that only a year or two ago we had to pass a special law legislating out a chief of the fire department whom the Board of Commissioners had appointed, who was a newspaper reporter who had never even served as a member of the fire department anywhere. We passed a special law of Congress to get him out because we did not want that sort of a chief of the fire department.

When the District Commissioners had the appointment of the board of education a few years ago there was a little criticism because the wife of one of the District Commissioners was a member of the board. The committee thought if the Commissioners would have the appointment, I will say to the Senator from Kansas, that they would be besieged and be set upon by the people locally here to appoint this director of education, and that they would not have the acquaintance throughout the country, and they would not be as free and untrammeled as a man who did not live here.

Mr. LONG. The Senator will remember that I did not insist that the appointment should be made by the District Commissioners. I objected to the appointment being made by the Commissioner of Education.

Mr. BURKETT. I may be wrong, but I understood that the Senator from Kansas wanted the director to be appointed by the Commissioners. I know he did not want to have him appointed by the Commissioner of Education. I am very certain that I am correct in that position.

Mr. SCOTT. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. BURKETT. Certainly.

Mr. SCOTT. Were the previous board of education paid a salary?

Mr. BURKETT. They were.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator will permit me that the RECORD may be right, the Senator alludes to the fact that the wife of one of the Commissioners was on the board. It is proper it should go in the RECORD that she was on the board when her husband became a Commissioner and she was continued on the board during his administration up to a certain time.

Mr. BURKETT. It is not my opinion that any legitimate criticism ever attached to that member of the Board of Commissioners, but I spoke of it merely as one of the criticisms that were made at that time and discussed at that time.

Mr. GALLINGER. It was discussed a great deal.

Mr. BURKETT. It was the opinion of the committee that when we got a superintendent of schools here in the District we ought to look the country over and get the very best one we could. As I said a moment ago, when Milwaukee, Wis., wanted a superintendent they looked the country over and got the best man they could get, and they had to get him from a town in Nebraska. When Boston wants a school superintendent, they do not confine themselves to Boston. There is not a town in the country I ever heard of that insisted on getting a superintendent or director or principal of schools from the local community.

I will state just why it is not possible even to get a man here to be superintendent of schools. It is because you have no other town smaller than Washington to fit and prepare a good man to be superintendent of schools. Take the State of Indiana. There are a dozen large towns in the State, and when Indianapolis wants a superintendent of schools they can go to the next-sized town and get a superintendent there and bring him up to Indianapolis. He has had a training at the head of a school system almost as large as that of Indianapolis. If they are not satisfied, they will go to some other State or something of that sort. But in the District of Columbia there is not a resident here who has had any experience as any sort of a superintendent. So they have to go outside to get their superintendent.

A man may be proficient as a bank clerk in any department, but until he has been president of some little bank he is not competent, because he has never had the experience of managing a bank. I use that as an illustration because of what the president of a great bank only recently said to me. I was speaking with reference to getting a young man a position. He said, "Let him start out in some little bank, where he can be a cashier of the bank instead of a bank clerk. Then he will be eligible for a little larger bank in a supervisory capacity; but let him start out in a big bank as a clerk, and it is with great difficulty, practically impossible, for him ever to be put in a managerial capacity."

Now, I want to speak of the item with reference to the abolishment of the thirteen supervising principals. I do not know, Mr. President, whether it is worth while to put any energy into this matter until after the Senate shall fill up the chairs.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from West Virginia suggests the absence of a quorum. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ankeny	Curtis	Heyburn	Rayner
Bacon	Dick	Hopkins	Scott
Bankhead	Dillingham	Johnston	Simmons
Bourne	Dolliver	Kean	Smith, Mich.
Brandegee	du Pont	Long	Smoot
Briggs	Elkins	McCreary	Stewart
Brown	Flint	McCumber	Sutherland
Bulkeley	Foster	Nelson	Taliaferro
Burkett	Frye	Nixon	Taylor
Burnham	Gallinger	Overman	Teller
Burrows	Gamble	Paynter	Warren
Clay	Gary	Perkins	Wetmore
Cullom	Guggenheim	Piles

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Fifty-one Senators have answered to their names. A quorum of the Senate is present. The Senator from Nebraska will proceed.

Mr. BURKETT. Mr. President, I want to take up the question of these thirteen supervising principals, and I want to call attention to what it is that they do. There is not another place in the United States that has them except Washington. Every other place in the country has a principal of schools, and above all the several principals of the schools is the superintendent of schools, with an assistant. Here in Washington they have the principal of schools, and then they will group about fourteen or fifteen schools together, like the Force and the Adams, and so forth, and they will put a man over those schools and they will call him a supervising principal. The principal of that school has no particular authority—no such authority as school principals usually have. If a patron goes to the school, he must wait until the supervising principal gets there, who has thirteen or fourteen other schools, and if there is anything to be done with reference to the teachers, which are local, the supervising superintendent attends to it. So the real principals of the schools are the thirteen supervising principals.

In the bill two years ago we provided for the principals. We gave them $30 a room extra as salary, so the principal of a school would be a principal in fact. But we still have the thirteen supervising principals. We said at that time we hoped that the board of education would discontinue them, but of course they have not done it.

I have had prepared by a competent authority a statement showing the number of supervisors and the cost of supervision in ten cities of 100,000 population and over. I want to call the attention of the Senate to just what this thing means in the District of Columbia. For instance, in Boston, a town with a population of 595,000, they have six assistant superintendents—that is, six assistants to the superintendent in a professional capacity. In Chicago, Ill., with pretty nearly 2,000,000, they have eight; Cincinnati, Ohio, has two; Cleveland, Ohio, seven; Indianapolis and Los Angeles, two each; St. Louis, five; Washington, twenty-one.

I want to call these things to the attention of the Senate to show why we are trying to ge rid of the thirteen supervising principals. They are entirely supernumerary, without any proper function, and they are expensive.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Do they have the same general authority in the cities you have named as in Washington?

Mr. BURKETT. Yes; supervisory authority. I wish to call attention to the special subjects of the supervisors. We are loaded up. The Senate will remember that when we reported the bill two years ago the committee made a thorough investigation, and the fact that we did not have to have such a hearing this year, as some Senators apparently think we might have had, was because we had very exhaustive hearings two years ago and every one of these questions was gone into at that time in the evidence. Both these questions were decided in the affirmative then. But for fear that we would kill that bill, which had control of the salaries and all that, we did not put these matters in.

I wish to show another place where we are loaded up in the District of Columbia with these supervisors. For instance, I take the supervisors of special subjects: Baltimore, 7; Boston, 6; Chicago, 4; Cincinnati, 7; Cleveland, 6; Indianapolis, 6; Los Angeles, 4; Rochester, 5; St. Louis, 7; Washington, 15. I just want to make that comparison so that the Senate may see how we are placed here.

The next one is executive and supervisory officers, excluding building principals. I want to call this to the attention of the Senate, because I have excluded the building principals in both places. Baltimore has 34; Boston, 13; Chicago, 13; Cincinnati, 10; Cleveland, 14; Indianapolis, 9; Los Angeles, 7; New York, 42; Rochester, 7; St. Louis, 13, and Washington, 58.

That is the way we are loaded up with supervision here in the District of Columbia. When I come to the column to show the cost of schools here, you will not wonder at it to find how we are loaded up and top-heavy with supervision here in the District of Columbia.

There is not any legitimate place for these supervising principals. It never was contended that there was any place for the supervising principals, except originally, when they were put in, as I understand. It is a tradition with me. I have not been able nor inclined to go into it. I have not wanted to do it. But they were put in to provide places for friends of a member of the board away back, years ago. They were increased from time to time until there got to be thirteen of them, and the town was divided up and a dozen schools put under each one, and he was called a supervising principal. As I said, we wanted to do away with them and to put the duties and responsibilities on the principals of the schools. So we provided in the bill we passed two years ago $30 a room extra for the principal, from the fact that he was a principal, and recommended in our remarks and report that the board of education should do away with these supervising principals. But they have not done it.

So the committee come back this year and recommends by legislation what the board of education will not do. It may cause some little more jar this way than if the board had weeded them out, but the board refused to do it, and the committee comes with the recommendation that we legislate them out and say to the board, "We have too much supervision."

I am not going to read any more of these tables. I have them here, and if there is no objection I will ask that I may put them in the RECORD. However, let me read just one more.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BULKELEY in the chair). Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. BURKETT. Certainly.

Mr. CARTER. The Senator intimated in the course of his remarks that he had some figures showing the comparative expense per capita of education in the District of Columbia and in the city of Boston and elsewhere, which might throw some very important light on this subject. If he has such figures, I would be glad to have him set them forth and comment on them in his remarks.

Mr. BURKETT. Let me read another column. I have insisted that we have too much supervision, too much management here. I have a column giving the number of teachers to each supervising officer in the various schools. Baltimore has eleven times as many teachers as supervising officers; Chicago has eighteen times as many teachers as supervising officers; Cleveland, fifteen times as many; Indianapolis, twelve times; Los Angeles, thirteen times; New York, twelve; Rochester, fifteen; St. Louis, twelve times, and Washington, seven times—lower than any of them. And does anyone doubt that we are top-heavy here with supervision?

Now, I will get to the teachers and officers and show the comparative cost.

In Baltimore the teachers and officers cost $1,091,000; in Boston, $2,665,000; in Cincinnati, $848,000; in Cleveland, $1,460,000; in Indianapolis, $588,000; Los Angeles, $673,000; Rochester, $481,000; Washington, $1,370,500—more than towns that have two or three times as many people as we have here in the District.

Mr. NELSON. Is it not a fact that Washington is in all respects, not only for the schools, but also for Senators and Congressmen, the most expensive place in the country because it is the capital of the country, and do not the people of this District have an extra expense because it is the capital of the country?

Mr. BURKETT. I think that is true and is known by all of us. That is one of the reasons we have been arguing why not only the salaries of clerks should be raised, but some argued two years ago that for that reason the salaries of Senators should be raised. I gave that statement simply because it was called for by some one here.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator's figures relate to salaries, do they not?

Mr. BURKETT. Yes; certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. And salaries are not very different here from elsewhere in amount.

Mr. BURKETT. Well, they are a little higher, I will say, than in some places. The Senator remembers that our committee found that they were lower than in some places.

Mr. GALLINGER. The idea is being constantly forced on the Appropriations Committee that we must increase still further the salaries of employees or they will leave here and go to other cities, and it is said that they are going in great numbers.

Mr. BURKETT. I have in another column which I have prepared the amount expended for the executive and supervisory officers exclusive of building principals.

I want to go through this list without the teaching force. This is just for supervision, and I want to compare it. In Baltimore supervision costs $60,900, in Boston $48,456, in Cleveland $32,000, in Los Angeles $11,000, Rochester—I have not the data—St. Louis $32,000, Washington $68,955. So we see that when we compare these two points in the bill one is to put the management of these schools in some other hands than the board of education, and the other is to abolish the thirteen supervising principals.

The table referred to is as follows:

Number of supervisors and cost of supervision, etc., in cities of 100,000 population and upward.

City.	Population.	Number of—				Amount expended for pay of—					Proportion of tuition money expended for—			Number of teachers.	Number teachers to each supervising officer, excluding executive officers, special supervisors and district and building principals.
		Assistant superintendents.	Supervisors of special subjects.	Executive and supervisory officers, excluding building principals.	Executive and supervisory officers of all kinds, including building principals.	Superintendent.	Assistant superintendents.	Supervisors of special subjects.	All executive and supervisory officers exclusive of building principals.	Teachers and officers.	Superintendent and assistants.	All executive and supervisory officers except building principals. Mr. BURKETT. Mr. President, as I said a moment ago, there is no one practically in this community who is objecting to the abolishment of the board of education. That is not where any trouble lies in this bill, and there never would be any opposition to it if we had left it at that. But when we undertook to abolish the thirteen supervising principals a world of things got into the bill. As has been said, they were so situated that they could get influence, not improperly, but because they were interested, among the 1,300 teachers in the District.

Another thing has crept in. Every college that has happened to graduate one of these supervising principals has been urging it, and wherever there has been a friend of that particular college they have worked their friendship here, and the endeavor has been very far-reaching, and so the bill has incurred a good deal of opposition.

I will say to the Senate, for whatever it may be worth, that at the time the superintendents of all the United States were here some three weeks ago, and all the best educators of the country were gathered here as part of the National Educational Association, I took occasion to talk with just as many of those best school men as I could get into conversation with, and I never found a single one of them who did not say to me in words, in effect, "You will never have an educational system in Washington that is a success until you abolish the supervising-principal system." Every one of them, without exception, said that.

I will not say that much with reference to the board of education. Most of those with whom I talked did not want to express any opinion of the board of education, but some of them thought it would not be possible to abolish the board of education. Some of them had some misgivings on that point, but not one of them had any misgivings as to the supervising-principal end of it. Every one of them said, "You must abolish them before you can ever hope to have a good school system."

I will tell you why. Those thirteen supervising principals are between the superintendent and the teachers. There they are. Nothing can get to the superintendent except through those supervising principals. Nothing can get down except through them. We remember that two years ago we remedied the same abuse in the high schools. We had only five high schools and a hundred or so teachers, and we could wipe out the abuses there. We could not do it in the graded schools, because there were thirteen of them and they represented 1,300 teachers, and we did not dare do it in that bill. Now, there is nothing and nobody and no authority between the superintendent of schools and the principals of the high schools.

We are trying to do, in this bill, for the graded schools exactly what we did for the high schools in the bill two years ago, and so far from wiping out or defeating or destroying our school system, as some people seem to be so dreadfully afraid of, let me say that there is nothing in the bill but what was considered favorably when we reported it two years ago.

Mr. TELLER. I want to ask the Senator from Nebraska a question. I was called out of the Chamber.

Mr. BURKETT. I will say to the Senator that as soon as I got my statement made I looked for him, but he had gone.

Mr. TELLER. The Senator has been complaining of this board of education. I believe it is the universal custom of the country to conduct schools by a board.

Mr. BURKETT. At every place but one that I know of in the country.

Mr. TELLER. That is the case, so far as I know.

Mr. BURKETT. There is one place I know of where they do not have a board of education.

Mr. TELLER. If there is a fault with this board, it is as to the method of selection. If there is anything that the people of this country are close to it, it is the school system. If there is anything, I think, that the people have an interest in, it is the school system.

I wanted to know of the Senator, who has examined this matter, whether the experiment had ever been tried in this city of allowing the patrons of the school or the people in the city, without reference to whether they sent children to school or not, to control the schools by the election of a board such as we have in other sections of the country, such as I presume the Senator has in Nebraska, such as we certainly have in Colorado.

Mr. BURKETT. The Senator probably knows more about the change of government in the District than I do, but of course when the law was changed in 1874 the right of suffrage was taken away from the people of the District, and since then the boards have been appointed.

Mr. TELLER. That is what I understood, Mr. President. I do not know how the board away back in 1874—that was before my day here—was selected, but I do know that as a rule all through the country the best school systems are those managed by a board of directors; and it is very unpalatable to me to think of appointing one man who has the absolute control of the school system in this capital city.

Mr. President, I do not know much about present conditions in the schools here. I have for a good many years believed that the schools here were not equal in many respects to schools in other sections of the country. I know for some time when the question was up as to school buildings, and so forth, here I have felt that we were very tardy in providing proper school facilities, and I believe that has been the case. Our expenditures may be very high, but we have not wasted any money in my opinion on school funds. We have never voted as much money as I think we ought to have voted.

SETTLEMENT OF STATE ACCOUNTS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated by the Secretary.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 415) regulating the settlement of the accounts between the United States and the several States relative to the disposition of the public lands, and for other purposes.

Mr. NELSON. I ask that the bill be temporarily laid aside until the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] can finish his remarks.

Mr. TELLER. I do not care about it. I will take up the question when the school bill comes up again.

Mr. NELSON. Then I call for the regular order.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill.

Mr. BACON. I understand that two amendments were proposed yesterday afternoon and that the first of those is now pending.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the amendment proposed by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON].

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add at the end of the bill the following additional sections:

SEC. —. That jurisdiction be, and is hereby, given to the Court of Claims to adjudicate the claim or claims of any owner, or the legal representative of any owner, to the proceeds of any abandoned or captured property which have heretofore been placed in the United States Treasury, notwithstanding any former suit to recover said proceeds may have been dismissed by said court for want of jurisdiction: Provided, That suit to recover the same shall be commenced within two years from the passage of this act.

SEC. —. That any testimony, affidavits, reports of officers, and other papers on file in the Departments or in the courts, relating to such claims, shall be considered by the court as competent evidence: Provided, That such testimony, affidavits, reports of officers, and other papers were competent evidence at the time they were so filed.

SEC. —. That no judgment shall be rendered in favor of any claimant under the provisions of this act, unless said claimant shall establish the fact that the proceeds of the property sued for were covered into the Treasury of the United States and became a part of the fund known as the captured and abandoned property fund, under the provisions of the act of March 12, 1863, and the acts amendatory thereof, and is now a part of the general fund of the United States Treasury, and all such judgments rendered under this act shall be paid to the original owner, his heirs, or legal representatives, by the Secretary of the Treasury, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

SEC. —. That all sales, transfers, or assignments of any claims against said fund heretofore or hereafter made and all contracts heretofore made for fees and allowances to claimants' attorneys are hereby declared null and void, and all warrants issued by the Secretary of the Treasury in payment of such judgments shall be made payable and delivered only to the claimant or his lawful heirs, executors, or administrators, except so much thereof as shall be allowed claimants' attorneys by the court for prosecuting said claims; and the Court of Claims in rendering judgment under this act shall, in each case, fix the amount of compensation to the attorney or attorneys prosecuting the claim in said court.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I make the point of order that the amendment is entirely foreign and not germane to the bill under consideration. It relates to an entirely different subject.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Under what rule does the Senator make the point of order?

Mr. NELSON. I think under the general principles of parliamentary law an amendment must be germane to the subject-matter under consideration. The amendment relates to an entirely new and distinct subject.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair is of opinion that the point of order must be determined by the practice which obtains in the Senate. It has been repeatedly decided that amendments which are not germane to bills—other than general appropriation bills—are not subject to a point of order. The Chair is of opinion that the point of order is not well taken and therefore overrules it. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. HOPKINS. The amendment, as I understand it, involves a very large sum of money and is a question that has been heretofore considered in both branches of Congress. Before the vote is taken I should like to hear from the Senator who presented the amendment, and get his reasons at some length for adopting the amendment.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, this is, as is correctly stated by the Senator from Illinois, a very important matter; but it is not a new matter in the consideration of either House of Congress.

I will state that the amendment which I have offered is copied from a bill which is now pending in the House of Representatives, a bill which has been favorably reported by the Committee on War Claims of that body. I hold in my hand the report of that committee, which states in detail the reasons why the bill should be enacted into law. The report gives a very much clearer and more concise statement of the case than I could possibly give in an oral presentation of it to the Senate, and therefore, if it is desired, I will ask that the report be read from the desk. It is better than any argument which I can make upon the subject.

I will state, however, to the Senate, Mr. President, that this matter has been a number of times before the two Houses of Congress. The report which I hold in my hand, in its concluding paragraph, gives the number of Congresses in which there has been favorable action by the committees, and I will read them. I am going to ask that the entire report be read, if the Senator desires the information, but in order that we may properly appreciate it, I will read first the concluding part of it, which shows the number of times this matter has been under favorable consideration. The report concludes in this way:

> Time and again favorable reports have been made by one House or the other upon bills having in view the same purpose as the bill now under consideration. In the Fifty-second Congress, first session, the Judiciary Committee of this House made such report on H. R. 455 (Report No. 1377).
> In the Fifty-third Congress, second session, the Judiciary Committee upon a number of bills of like character adopted a report of the same committee made in the preceding Congress.
> The same in the Fifty-fourth Congress, second session (House Report No. 2568, from the Committee on War Claims, on H. R. 7618).
> The same in the Fifty-fifth Congress, third session (Senate Report No. 1634).
> The same in the Fifty-seventh Congress, first session (Senate Report No. 1292).
> The same in the Fifty-eighth Congress, second session (Senate Report No. 1861).
> The same in the Fifty-ninth Congress, first session (Senate Report No. 3290).
> The same in the Fifty-ninth Congress, second session (House Report No. 7540, from the Committee on War Claims, on H. R. 15400).

So it will be seen, Mr. President, that this measure has had a favorable report three times from the House committee, twice from the Judiciary Committee, and once from the War Claims Committee, and four times in four separate Congresses from the Senate Committee on Claims.

Mr. HOPKINS. Does the report show whether there were minority reports made in those different Congresses?

Mr. BACON. It does not.

Mr. HOPKINS. It does not show that?

Mr. BACON. It does not; but in the case of this report there is no minority report, I will say to the Senator.

I will state in brief the outline of the facts, and then I am going to ask that this report, which is not long, shall be read to the Senate, because I realize the fact that the inquiry of the Senator from Illinois is an entirely proper one; that full information should be given to the Senate before it is called upon to act, and that full information is contained in the report.

Without stopping now to give dates, because it will all be stated more fully by the report, and as I am endeavoring now simply to give an outline, there was legislation by Congress which authorized exactly such procedure as is provided for in the pending amendment, to wit, that there shall be a hearing by the Court of Claims to determine who were the parties, or their present representatives, to whom the cotton originally belonged which was sold, the proceeds of which is now in the Treasury. There was a limitation of two years within which parties interested must make their application, in order that their claims might be adjudicated. After the expiration of the two years there was still a large fund in the Treasury which had not been thus distributed, and Congress passed another law, which is embodied, if I recollect aright, in the Revised Statutes. If the Senator has the Revised Statutes before him and will turn to section 1059, he will find there embodied the legislation to which I refer.

But that act failed to specifically make allusion to the limitation of two years which was in the prior act, and, as set forth in this report, when the matter again came before the court it very strangely ruled that the limitation, not having been removed, still applied, the very strange ruling being made that as to an act subsequently made a statute of limitation existing prior to the enactment of the statute still obtained.

Now, this is to give the claimants the same right that section 1059 gives. In other words, it removes the two years' barrier that the court ruled section 1059 failed to remove.

I want to say to the Senate that there is no question about the fact—that is, in a general way—as to the persons to whom this fund belongs. The Supreme Court has ruled specifically that this money does not belong to the Government of the United States. They have ruled specifically that the Government of the United States holds it in trust for the parties to whom the cotton originally belonged, the proceeds of which is now in the Treasury. The amendment is simply for the purpose of enabling the parties thus ruled by the court to be entitled to it to be ascertained and the amount due to them to be determined.

There is in the Treasury over $10,000,000 that composes the fund arising from the sale of captured cotton. I may state generally that while I do not know that the report specifically points out the fact, it is a fact—at least I so understand it—that a considerable part of it was cotton which belonged to the Confederate States, and that of course now belongs to the Government of the United States; and, so far as that part of the fund is concerned, this amendment can not in any manner interfere with it. It only reaches the part of the fund which is the proceeds of the cotton belonging to individuals, and, as Senators will find if they will listen to the reading of this report, it is a fund which the Supreme Court have specifically ruled and determined belongs to those parties, and that the Government of the United States holds it in trust for them.

Year after year, Congress after Congress, a bill like this has been before one House or the other and has received a favorable report on the part of the committee charged with its consideration, and it has just simply passed by without action by either House in the inability to get action upon it.

I now ask, Mr. President, that the report may be read; and I hope Senators will give attention to it, because it specifically answers the question which the Senator from Illinois [Mr. HOPKINS] very correctly propounded, and gives information which the Senate ought to have before it is called upon to act.

Mr. GAMBLE. Will the Senator from Georgia yield to me for a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PILES in the chair). Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. BACON. With pleasure.

Mr. GAMBLE. Does the Senator from Georgia know of any bill pending in the Senate covering the provisions of this amendment or whether any such bill has been introduced in the Senate during the present session of Congress?

Mr. BACON. There is a similar bill pending, but not exactly this same bill. I will state to the Senator that I have offered this House bill as an amendment rather than to offer a Senate bill, for the reason that it has had the consideration of the House committee and, therefore, if it should be favorably acted on by the Senate, it would have the advantage of having already had such consideration.

Mr. GAMBLE. But the bill which was introduced in the Senate has not been acted upon?

Mr. BACON. It has not.

Mr. GAMBLE. Nor favorably reported?

Mr. BACON. It has not; but I will say these bills differ in no material part, nor does this bill differ in any material part from the four separate bills which have been before the Senate and have been reported favorably by the Committee on Claims in four different Congresses.

Mr. GAMBLE. But, as I understand it, this covers an amount of about $10,000,000.

Mr. BACON. My information is that the amount which will be due to individuals is only about $5,000,000. There is a fund amounting to over $10,000,000; but, as I have previously stated, a large part of that was for cotton captured from the Confederate authorities; and, of course, that is the property of the United States. This only relates really, if my information is correct, to about $5,000,000 which has been in the Treasury of the United States for forty years under a distinct ruling of the Supreme Court of the United States that not a dollar of it belongs to the Government of the United States, and that the Government holds it simply as a trustee for those parties.

Mr. GAMBLE. There has been no action taken by the Senate upon these different bills?

Mr. BACON. The matter has never come to a vote in the Senate, but it has been up repeatedly, just as it is up now and just as it is now, each time there having been such suggestions as the Senator from South Dakota is now making. It is by such suggestions, which have removed it from the consideration of the Senate before action could be taken, that this simple and plain act of justice has been deferred and defeated up to this time.

Mr. GAMBLE. The only reason I had for making the suggestion was that the provisions of the bill under consideration are entirely distinct and separate and cover another proposition entirely.

Mr. BACON. That has been ruled upon.

Mr. GAMBLE. I know; I recognize that fact, but the amendment proposed by the Senator from Georgia ought to rest upon its own substantial foundation. It occurs to me, Mr. President, that a bill which comes to the Senate ought to have been before a committee of the Senate and ought to have been regularly reported and placed upon the Calendar. I presume, as such assurance has been given by the Senator from Georgia, that bills substantially the same as the proposed amendment have heretofore been reported.

Mr. BACON. Differing in no material particular, if in any particular.

Mr. GAMBLE. But it occurs to me, Mr. President, that it is a matter that should be taken up separately and considered separately and distinctly from the measure now pending before the Senate.

Mr. BACON. I do not think so, Mr. President. I quite disagree with the learned Senator from South Dakota. Here is a bill which proposes to take money out of the Treasury, to pay it to the different States, money which has not been ruled by the courts to belong to those States, but which the Senator from South Dakota, as chairman of the committee reporting this bill—possibly he is the author of the bill; I am not sure about that——

Mr. GAMBLE. I do not think I shall claim distinction as the author of the bill, because, as a matter of fact, similar propositions have been pending in Congress for fifty years.

Mr. BACON. Yes.

Mr. GAMBLE. I recall a very learned and splendid debate here some twenty-six years ago, in which the chief proposition in this bill was covered. It is not a new proposition, and it has been insisted upon that, with certain modifications, this bill should go forth.

Mr. BACON. There is a remarkable ligament which unites these two propositions and which makes it entirely a matter of consistency that we should consider them together. One has been pending for forty years and the other has been pending for fifty years; they are both somewhat hoary with age, and it is about time, I think, that they were laid to rest, and we should lay them to rest, and the Senate should take final action upon them.

But, as I was proceeding to say, I am not disposed to disparage the claims of those who favor the bill in its original shape for the distribution of a certain fund to the States which have in them the lands upon which they claim the right to 5 per cent, although the lands have never been sold and there is no fund in the Treasury out of which this 5 per cent is to be taken; but representing, as I understand it, the value of lands which have been disposed of otherwise than by sale. There is an equity in the matter which the Senators claim, and they are asking that the Congress of the United States shall recognize that equity and shall pay these millions of dollars to these various States. Now, without taking any issue with the Senator on that subject at all, I say that this is a fund in the Treasury which the Supreme Court have solemnly adjudicated it does not belong to the Government of the United States, and have solemnly adjudicated that it does belong to the parties whom we seek to have identified, and the sole office of this legislation is not to devote a fund to certain interests or certain parties, but to identify the people to whom the Supreme Court say this fund belongs.

Why, Mr. President, it is not to the credit of the Congress of the United States that there should be a fund in the Treasury of the United States which the supreme tribunal of this land have solemnly determined does not belong to the Government of the United States. It is not to the credit of the Congress of the United States that for any reason we should hesitate or pause in the work of giving that money to those to whom the Supreme Court have solemnly adjudged it to belong, and that is the sole question here.

I am not going to detain the Senate, but I want to ask that this report be read, and I ask that Senators listen to it. Then I want to see if there is a Senator in this Chamber who, after hearing this report, will vote that this money shall remain in the Treasury of the United States when it is not the property of the United States and not subject to be used by the United States, but only withheld from those to whom the Supreme Court says it belongs.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Georgia asks that the report to which he refers be read. Without objection, the report will be read.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I do not know whether Senators are going to insist upon a roll call on this question. If they do, I want those who are to vote upon it to hear this report, because, as I repeat, I want to know if there is a Senator who can hear this report and who will then vote against the bill. I therefore suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The absence of a quorum being suggested, the Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Allison	Clark, Wyo.	Hopkins	Rayner
Ankeny	Clay	Johnston	Scott
Bacon	Curtis	Lodge	Smith, Md.
Bankhead	Dillingham	Long	Smith, Mich.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, April 2, 1908.

The House met at 12 o'clock m.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. CROCKETT, its reading clerk, announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 1050. An act to repeal section 3480 of the Revised Statutes of the United States;

S. 5268. An act for the relief of J. de L. Lafitte; and

S. 2934. An act permitting homestead entries upon certain lands in Whatcom County, Wash., being a portion of the "Point Roberts Reserve."

The message also announced that the Senate had passed with amendment bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

H. R. 7618. An act to authorize the Benton Water Company, its successors or assigns, to construct a dam across the Snake River, in the State of Washington.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bill of the following title:

H. R. 1815. An act for the relief of the estate of D. S. Phelan.

SENATE BILLS REFERRED.

Under clause 2, Rule XXIV, Senate bills of the following titles were taken from the Speaker's table and referred to their appropriate committees as indicated below:

S. 1050. An act to repeal section 3480 of the Revised Statutes of the United States—to the Committee on the Judiciary.

S. 5268. An act for the relief of J. de L. Lafitte—to the Committee on Claims.

S. 754. An act for ascertaining the feasibility and probable cost of constructing a canal from the Tennessee River, at or near the city of Chattanooga, in the State of Tennessee, to the navigable waters of the Ocmulgee River, in the State of Georgia, by which there will be furnished adequate water communication by the shortest and most practicable route between the Atlantic Ocean and the navigable waters in the rivers of the Mississippi Valley—to the Committee on Railways and Canals.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. WILSON of Illinois, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 15444. An act extending the time for the construction of a dam across Rainy River;

H. R. 1815. An act for the relief of the estate of D. S. Phelan; and

H. R. 13735. An act to correct the military record of Micaiah R. Evans.

AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Speaker, I move now that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the agricultural appropriation bill.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. WILLIAMS) there were—ayes 140, noes 55.

So the motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 19158, the agricultural appropriation bill, Mr. FOSTER of Vermont in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. Upon adjournment yesterday there was a point of order pending and reserved.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Chairman, my purpose in reserving the point of order to the new language in the paragraph under consideration was to express my opposition to and protest against what seemed to me to be the almost inevitable tendency of this particular legislation toward ultimate Federal construction of public highways, and, of course, incidental control of the highways of the country by the Federal Government. It is an amendment that is fraught with great danger. I have no objection at all to the Federal Government making scientific experiments and giving expert advice upon the road question, and the language to which the point of order is directed simply enlarges the scope of the Agriculture Department in the work of making experiments and giving advice, and on consultation with the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture, and obtaining a more satisfactory and a fuller explanation of the purposes and intention of this new provision, I have concluded to withdraw the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana withdraws the point of order.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. There is an amendment pending——

Mr. SCOTT. I ask that the pending amendment be reported.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by striking out all after the word "dollars," in line 11, down to and including the word "machinery," in line 13, page 44.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Chairman, the language proposed to be stricken out by my amendment reads as follows:

That no part of this appropriation shall be expended for the rent or purchase of road-making machinery.

I do not know what influence or reasoning controlled the Committee on Agriculture in placing this limitation on the appropriation bill. No preceding Congress has put such limitation on the power of the Secretary of Agriculture to use the money appropriated for the support and maintenance of the Bureau of Public Roads. I am at a loss to know what has come over the spirit of the dreams of this committee. I know there has been no demand coming from the farmers and the country people generally for this new policy. I undertook the other day to elicit from the chairman of the committee in his opening speech the reasons which controlled his committee in undertaking to impose this limitation upon the appropriation. The information which the gentleman gave was not satisfactory to me, and I am of the opinion it is not satisfactory to this House, and I am confident that it will not be satisfactory to the agricultural people of this country. But no doubt those who are in favor of prohibiting the Secretary of Agriculture and the Director of Public Roads from either renting or buying machines for the purpose of constructing sections of object-lesson roads, whether macadam, sand clay, or the ordinary dirt road, will say that they have done it in the interest and for the benefit of the farmers, and in their name they propose to stop educational work so well planned by the Secretary of Agriculture; in order to save this splendid scheme with all of its resulting benefits, they propose to destroy it. That is the logic of their contention.

Mr. Chairman, the Bureau of Public Roads was established in 1893, and the petition presented to Congress asking that the Department of Public Roads be founded at Washington for the purpose of promoting the art of constructing and maintaining public roads and teaching students, in order that they might become skilled as road engineers, and to establish a permanent exhibit of sections of road, illustrating various methods of construction and the best road materials and machinery, was signed by governors of various States, boards of trade, and chambers of commerce throughout the country. But only an Office of Road Inquiry was established, with an appropriation of $10,000. It became the duty of the Secretary of Agriculture, under the law, to make inquiries through the Road Office as to the system of road management throughout the United States and to make investigations in regard to the best methods of road making, to prepare publications on the subject of public roads, and to assist agricultural colleges and experiment stations on this subject. Annual appropriations of $10,000 were made until the fiscal year of 1896, when it was reduced to $8,000, and it remained at that until the year 1900, when it was increased to $14,000. Then it was that the work began to grow and expand, and the appropriation has been gradually increased from year to year, until it reached $70,000 last year. This bill carries an appropriation for the Bureau of $87,390—the largest in its history. It has twenty-three different classes of instruction, all of which are independent, and yet, in an important sense, dependent one upon another. But if one is more important than another, I say without hesitation that the object lesson in the construction of sections of road is the most important. The Bureau of Public Roads, under the direction of the Secretary of Agriculture, has built and constructed sections of roads as object lessons in thirty-four different States in the Union, and they have now 600 applications on file, from all sections of the country, urging the Department for object lessons in road building.

This gives a faint conception of the estimate the people who are interested in roads place upon this work. There is less politics in the Agricultural Department than in any other Department in the Government. I believe the office is administered with absolute fairness and impartiality and for the best interest of all the people. The establishment of the Agriculture Department was not the act of any political party, but was the joint work of both Republicans and Democrats, and neither party is now asking that the Secretary be hampered and limited in the use of the money appropriated for the support of the great work he is prosecuting in the interest of better and more scientific methods of agriculture in all of its relations. Strange to say, the committee, without consulting the Secretary as to the wisdom of this unexpected innovation, the chairman, Mr. SCOTT, frankly admits, inaugurated the policy of its own motion and comes into the House without giving a single reason in its report for destroying the efficiency of the Bureau of Roads in its important work of educating the people along the line of road building. This course of the committee, if adopted by Congress, can mean nothing more or less than that the Secretary shall dispose of the machinery on hand in the near future and that the scientific men of the Bureau, who have been especially educated in the science of building roads, will be called into the office in Washington to make maps, issue bulletins, and make reports to be sent out to the people through the mails as a practical method of teaching them the value of good roads and how to build them. In my judgment this would be a serious mistake.

Mr. Chairman, the building of roads is an expensive enterprise, and when the people's money is appropriated for such purpose, it is highly important that an improved method of construction be adopted in the outset, whether it be macadam, sand clay, or ordinary dirt road. It is necessary, in the first place, to have a proper location and survey, and everybody knows this can not be done by a scientific man in his office in Washington, nor can he give instruction at long range as to the proper method of the preparation of the material for macadam and the excavations and the processes of placing and adjusting the material according to the various grades necessary to make a complete and perfect road.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I know near Jackson, Tenn., Mr. Lancaster, a local engineer, showed his people how to build good and lasting roads, and they went to building them. I have helped to build them myself. I did not have anybody to teach me. I made a bad road.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Do not take my time.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I will get you more time. Will the gentleman tell the House how road building is taught by the Government?

Mr. CRAWFORD. I was coming to that when the gentleman interrupted me. In my judgment, the great value in constructing sections of road as object lessons lies in the fact that it builds road sentiment, and does it more effectually than all the speaking that can be done by all the employees of the Government until doomsday. In my judgment, if Congress adopts this committee's recommendation, it means the death of the public-road spirit as far as the Government is concerned, and I confess that I am sorry to see it. I sincerely hope that the House will overrule the committee. It is not the business of the committee to legislate, but to make recommendations in order to enlighten the House, so that we may have the reasons for the legislation proposed. The gentleman from New York [Mr. DRISCOLL] gave an excuse for the action of the committee, but he did not give the reason. I gathered from his speech yesterday that he greatly feared that the United States Government was going into the business of building roads in the States at great expense and great danger of getting outside of the Constitution. Does the gentleman know how much we have spent in constructing object-lesson roads? I am sure that he does not. In 1907 the Secretary of Agriculture expended the enormous sum of $5,921 in rental and purchase of machinery, and in 1908 he spent $1,006.35.

This looks like going to the extreme; extravagance out of reason. If this ratio is kept up, and if the gentleman's apprehensions are well founded, all the public roads will be improved before the people find it out. The contention is ridiculous and absurd. The report of the Bureau shows that there are 2,100,000 miles of public road in the United States, and only 7 per cent is improved. No sane person is thinking that the United States will undertake to improve these roads. It would cost more than $6,000,000,000. The States and the local communities will go forward with road improvements until the main thoroughfares between the centers of population have been made to meet the demands of the people who use them, and every community should have an up-to-date road to enable the people to put their products in the market at the least possible cost. No expenditure of money will bring greater returns to the people than——

Mr. DRISCOLL. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. CRAWFORD. Yes; but be brief.

Mr. DRISCOLL. The gentleman said that the "gentleman from New York" feared larger appropriations. "The gentleman from New York" said that he feared that this was an entering wedge to commit this Government to the policy of building ordinary roads throughout the country; and what the gentleman has said now confirms that impression in my mind. He wants to get the United States Government to go down and fill the mud holes in the roads in his country. Make a beginning in this kind of work, and we can not stop it.

Mr. CRAWFORD. The gentleman is very much mistaken if he thinks that I want the Government to embark in a new policy in the way of building roads. I am only insisting that we continue the policy which has been in force for a number of years. But I would make the Bureau of Public Roads more efficient by giving it a larger appropriation, so as to thoroughly equip it, in that it might more speedily educate the people upon the important subject of good roads. Doubtless the gentleman has constitutional scruples. I observe that the Constitution gets very much in the way of some gentlemen when measures are proposed for the benefit of agricultural communities. Gentlemen have the capacity of contracting and expanding the Constitution so as to meet the emergency in particular cases. I am satisfied that the gentleman from New York and other gentlemen who are opposing this amendment are anxious and willing to vote enormous sums of money out of the Treasury to build up the merchant marine of this country, which the Republican party has destroyed in trying to protect it with tariff taxes. [Applause on the Democratic side.] The Democratic party from 1853 to 1861 built up our merchant marine, and the United States flag floated over our merchant ships in every harbor in the civilized world. These ships were manned by American seamen, carried American products of field and factory to the enrichment of the American people. But, alas, the prestige and glory of that once splendid commerce has perished from the high seas, and to-day the United States has not a merchant ship passing through the Suez Canal loaded with American products for the markets of the Far East. [Applause.] And that, too, notwithstanding we have the largest export trade of any Government in the world. But our corn, wheat, and cotton and a hundred other things, amounting last year to the enormous sum of $1,800,000,000, were carried in English and German ships from our own ports and distributed throughout the world. That is the result of your policy. Now——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Chairman. I ask unanimous consent that I proceed for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. CRAWFORD] asks the unanimous consent to continue his remarks five minutes. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I was just saying, Mr. Chairman, that the gentlemen who are unwilling to vote a few thousand dollars to aid the farmers in mastering their road problems are willing to vote subsidies to ship companies on the ground that it will increase commerce, forgetting, seemingly, that public roads are essential to commerce, primarily, as much so as transportation on the railroads and the steamship lines, for every pound of freight transported by rail and on the ships to the foreign markets has been hauled in wagons on country roads, and it is well known by those who are familiar with the transportation business that it often costs more to haul freight to the railroad than the railroads charge to a distant market.

Mr. Chairman, I discover that opposition to this amendment comes from some gentlemen whose States have been greatly aided by donations of the public lands to railroad companies as an inducement to extend their roads to the far West and on to the Pacific Ocean. Railroads are only another method of transportation, and, great and indispensable as they are, they would be absolutely worthless without the assistance and support of the wagons on the country roads. It is difficult to realize the value of a good system of public roads. In addition to the convenience and comfort of the people who use them, they add immensely to the wealth of the community and State. They draw to them enterprising and progressive people, and incidentally all the conveniences appear in due time. Really, there is an inspiration in a good road. No people have ever impoverished themselves by building roads. France has spent $600,000,000 in building public roads. She has 23,000 miles of the best road in the world, and has more money and wealth per capita than any other nation on the earth, and the wealth is more equally distributed among the people than it is in any other country. France has never sold a bond that was not purchased by her own people, and most of her bonds have been purchased by the peasants, so called, which means the country people.

Mr. Chairman, Buncombe and Mecklenburg counties in North Carolina have built more macadam road than any other two counties in the State, and these counties are at the head of the list in the way of progress and enterprise. They did not wait to become able to build roads, but, with a large faith in the wisdom of other people who have invested in good roads, they built, and found themselves able while building. It is only a question of a short time when every community of these counties will have a well-graded macadam road to their respective county towns. I desire to say that the Department of Agriculture gave these counties object lessons in road building a number of years ago.

Mr. Chairman, I hope to see the day come when this Department shall be sufficiently equipped to enable it to construct sections of road in every county of every State in the Union; then the people will fully appreciate the value of first-class roads, and the problem will be solved. Thomas Jefferson said:

> It is more remunerative, splendid, and noble to spend money in canals and roads that will build and promote social intercourse and commercial facilities than to expend it in armies and navies.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, I desire to say in this connection that the farmers have had less consideration in appropriations than any other class. There are 11,000,000 people directly and indirectly connected with the farm, and the value of their property, real and personal, is estimated by the Census Bureau at $20,000,000,000; and they produced $7,000,000,000 of farm and lumber products last year, and the balance of trade in favor of the United States on account of exports of various farm products was $444,000,000. Here lies the source of our prosperity, yet in the annual appropriations of a thousand million dollars we are giving to this great Department of Agriculture, which is willing and capable of putting the farming interests on a higher plane if fully equipped, the pitiable sum of $11,000,000. Congress should be more liberal in its dealings with these wealth producers and home builders on the farms. It should be remembered that in the millions of farm homes in this country lies the nation's security through all the years to come. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Chairman, some of us who sat here yesterday afternoon and listened to the debate upon the subject of the United States Government constructing roads within the States of this country believed that the political antipodes had come. We heard the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE], the leader of the Republican party on the floor, and the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER] both opposing the construction of roads within the States because it was unconstitutional and because it infringed on the rights of the States. We then heard the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] and our leader on this side, the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS], defending the building of roads by the States out of money supplied by the National Government; in other words, trying to reach indirectly what has been directly advocated by some gentlemen upon this floor. Now, as a Democrat, I wish to say that, basing my stand on the traditions of the Democratic party, so long as I am a Member of this House I will never vote for the construction by the National Government of roads within the States [applause on the Republican side] whether such appropriation is direct or indirect, whether as an out-and-out appropriation or as a loan to the States, which is the same thing under another guise.

The gentleman from Mississippi said that he advocated such a bill because there is a surplus in the Treasury and that surplus should be devoted to this purpose. My friends, there is no surplus in the Treasury so long as a national debt exists. There is a surplus of daily balance, but no real surplus; and if we go back into our history to the time when there was a surplus in the Treasury, when the national debt had been wiped out and President Andrew Jackson attempted to give over to the States as a loan the surplus in the Treasury, the direct result was the panic of 1837, and I think that any gentleman upon this floor should hesitate to advance that as a precedent for similar action to-day.

Another excuse offered by way of precedent is the contribution by the Central Government to the building of the transcontinental railways. That, however, is no precedent, because the organic act in which the Government undertook to aid the transcontinental railways stated that it was done as a military necessity, and it furnishes no excuse for the Federal Government embarking to-day upon a general policy of internal improvements in our country.

Propositions of this sort have come up in the past and were vetoed by Presidents Madison, Monroe, and Andrew Jackson; and if those are not good enough Democratic names in opposition to such a course by the National Government, why, I should like to ask what has become of the Democratic party? [Applause and laughter.]

Here is what President Jackson said:

> If it be the wish of the people that the construction of roads and canals should be conducted by the Federal Government, it is not only highly expedient but indispensably necessary that a previous amendment to the Constitution, delegating the necessary power and defining and restricting its exercise with reference to the sovereignty of the States should be made.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the reason why the National Government is asked to build these roads is that some of the States will not or can not do it. My State (New York) is doing it, the State of Massachusetts is doing it, the State of New Jersey is doing it, and all the States ought to do it, and they ought not to make a practice of asking the Government of the United States to do everything for the domestic affairs of the people of those States, even to feeding and clothing them, for that is what is coming if we embark upon socialistic policies of this sort. [Applause.]

Mr. POLLARD. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. CRAWFORD] seems to be very much exercised about the farmers of the country. He seems to be very anxious that legislation should be enacted in their favor. The facts are, Mr. Chairman, that the very object of this legislation is to enable the farmers of the country to get some benefit from the Bureau of Good Roads. That is the object of the limitation placed upon this paragraph. The purchase and use of machinery in the construction of country roads has been wholly devoted to the construction of macadam roads. Now, I do not know anything about the local conditions in the district of the gentleman from North Carolina, but I do know something about the conditions in my own district, and I want to say that I represent one of the richest agricultural districts in the United States. I do not believe there is a single farming community in any district in the United States that can afford to build macadam roads. It costs all the way from $3,000 to $7,000 a mile to build these macadam roads, and the committee desire to prevent the use of money in their construction, so that the Bureau of Good Roads can exert its energies in enabling the farmers of the country to take advantage of the other information they are disseminating for the construction of roads that are within the reach of every farming community, no matter whether it is the richest or the poorest agricultural district in the country. Only those communities that are contiguous to a city can afford a macadam road, when it costs such a great amount of money, but the Department has discovered that sand-clay roads and burnt-clay roads can be constructed, and that they are applicable to all the great agricultural regions of the country, at a cost of from $100 to $500 a mile. The construction of these roads is easily within the reach of every community within the United States. Now, what the Committee on Agriculture wants is that this money shall be used in introducing the construction of burnt-clay and sand-clay roads, which are within the reach of the farmers of the country, and not permit the Bureau to expend the money in building macadam roads for the benefit of the cities and towns of the country. That is the proposition before the House in this amendment and that is the object of the limitation the committee places upon this paragraph.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, may I inquire how much time remains?

The CHAIRMAN. Five minutes.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, it has been the opinion of the Committee on Agriculture ever since I have had the honor to be a member of that committee that it was not the function of the General Government to engage in the actual construction of public roads, and the committee was of the opinion that the language of the paragraph now under consideration had been so framed as not to admit of such road construction. It was therefore a matter of a good deal of surprise when the committee learned this year, upon interrogating the Chief of the Office, that actual construction was going on and that road machinery owned by the Government was being sent out for that purpose. The question was asked where he drew his authority for this action, and he stated that the word "illustrating" and the word "apparatus" were his authority. The word "illustrating" appears in connection with the following language: "For collating, digesting, reporting, and illustrating the results of such investigations and experiments." The word "apparatus" appears in this connection: "For necessary office fixtures and supplies, apparatus, and material." It is certainly the judgment of your committee that in neither of these connections does either word justify the purchase and use of road machinery. We do not want to strike out the words, because they are essential to the work of the Office, but we do not want to have them used to cover expenditures which the law never intended to authorize, and it was for that reason the proviso was inserted.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to call the attention of the House to what is being done by the Office of Public Roads at present. I read from a copy of the Washington Times of March 3, 1908, which reports the construction of a public road in the State of Wisconsin. It refers to an address by Samuel B. Lancaster, an official of the Road Office, on the improvement of highways, and states that as a result of that address the Bureau at Washington was prevailed upon to send an engineer with an outfit of road machinery to make three-quarters of a mile of highway. It was made in that particular county because that was the only county in Wisconsin which had made an appropriation for road building.

Does this House wish to authorize this Bureau to go into the country and send officials out to create a demand for the construction of public highways and then send the machinery to supply the demand? Three-quarters of a mile of road was built. Does not everybody know that the cost of that road, so far as it was carried on by the Department of Agriculture, was deducted from the amount which had been voted by the county for the purpose of constructing a road?

Now, what was the outfit sent out? "The Government outfit," this paper states, "consisted of a portable stone crusher, a revolving sieve which separates the rock after being crushed, a steam roller, a sprinkling wagon, bins, scrapers, and dumping wagons." Is there any Member of this House who thinks it is the business of the Government to own and operate machinery of that kind? There is nothing new or strange or complicated in that machinery. Any community can find men to operate it, and it seems to me as unreasonable that the Government should send this outfit and actually construct roads as it would be to have the Government go down into Texas, and, in order to instruct the people in growing cotton, should actually own the plows that turned the soil, own the planters that planted the seed, own the cultivators that cultivated the plants, and pay for the operation of all these implements.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee rose.

Mr. SCOTT. I can not yield. We are willing to continue the investigations which go to increase our knowledge relating to public roads, but it is certainly not necessary, in order to diffuse that knowledge, that the actual work of road building should be done by the Office of Good Roads. I certainly hope, therefore, that the amendment will be voted down. Now, Mr. Chairman, if I have any time remaining, I yield it to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. LAMB].

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Chairman, I will occupy the time of this House but a very few minutes. I want to answer the challenge that has been made to the Agricultural Committee on this floor, and particularly to the minority members of that committee. To reduce this thing to a practical question, if you strike out this language, you will have to quadruple this appropriation. Four times as much as we appropriate will be required if you have experiments in road building in all of the States of the Union. You can not differentiate between a demand that may come from the States, and the expenses of carrying this machinery from point to point in the United States will take an immense amount of money. It is unnecessary and it is not required in order to meet the work of this Bureau.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Virginia has expired.

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Chairman, I would like three minutes more.

Mr. SCOTT. As the gentleman from Virginia is a member of the committee, I ask unanimous consent that the time for debate be extended three minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request?

There was no objection.

Mr. LAMB. Now, one word in regard to the working of the roads in the States by appropriation by the General Government. There are 2,135,000 miles of road in the United States. One hundred and thirty-five thousand miles are improved, and that leaves in round numbers 2,000,000 miles of road in the United States. Suppose some such proposition as was suggested here yesterday, of appropriating $50,000,000 from the surplus in the Treasury, were put into effect and distribution made as proposed, have you any idea how much money it would give per mile? It would give $12 per mile for the roads in the United States. Why, Mr. Chairman, that would fill up about four mud holes in the South and perhaps mend one or two holes in these macadamized roads in the great North.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. How much does it cost to build this road a mile?

Mr. LAMB. Depends entirely upon the character of the road. From $2,000 to $3,000 a mile for the ordinary country road and from $4,000 to $7,000 a mile for the macadam road.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. The national road cost $20,000 a mile.

Mr. LAMB. That is an exception.

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman is mistaken about the great cost of these roads. It may cost a good deal of money to build a macadam road, but in the hearings he will find a number of sand-clay roads have been built through the work of this Office at a reasonable cost.

Mr. LAMB. I understand that a plain dirt road can be built for $1,800 or $2,000 per mile. This appropriation of $50,000,000 would not give over $25 a mile for a road. Now, how many years would it take to complete the work? The calculation I make is two hundred and forty years. Suppose you required the States to furnish one-half of the amount; then it would take one hundred years to do this work. There is no authority in the Constitution of the United States for the General Government to do any such work in the States. The Constitution says the General Government may establish post-roads. That is all. No matter what these lawyers may say, we men of common sense who are not lawyers can read the Constitution just as well as they can. [Applause.]

Mr. WEEKS. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. LAMB. Yes.

Mr. WEEKS. I want to ask the gentleman from Virginia if any machinery is needed to build these sand-clay roads which the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. THOMAS] just referred to?

Mr. LAMB. Not at all; and I am glad the gentleman interrupted me. They made one of these object-lesson roads in one of my counties, and the supervisors of that county themselves told me that they knew more about working the roads than these people who came down there to teach them that lesson. [Applause.]

This was because local conditions are better understood by those who have lived all their lives in the community where the work is to be done. The Bureau of Good Roads is doing a good work along educational lines. The Chief of the Bureau is a well-equipped young man, and is an enthusiast in this work. The Committee on Agriculture has increased the appropriation this year. There is no necessity for this amendment. I hope you will stand by the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. Time for debate is exhausted.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I have listened with much interest and profit to the discussion of the general policy of Federal aid and Federal power in the construction and maintenance of public roads, and while this is most interesting and instructive, it is not my intention to take part in it, but rather to confine my remarks to the subject which is really before the House, to the paragraph now pending. No individual and no government can assume or accept power without taking with it the burdens and responsibilities that go with power, and Congress can not constitute itself an exception to this rule. The Constitution confers upon Congress the power to establish post-offices and post-roads, and with that power comes the burden which we must in proper measure and in proper fashion meet. There is nothing in this paragraph or in this bill which commits the Federal Government to any policy of road construction in the several States, and nothing that even points in that direction. The Government has, however, some duty to discharge in the matter as well as the local authorities, and when we establish rural mail routes over which the United States mails are to be carried to the people, we do and must assume in some measure the burden of providing a road over which the route is to be maintained. We have not gone far along this line yet, and I do not know that we shall ever go much further, but the limits to our burden which this bill sets are surely narrow enough. The local authorities are left to bear all the expense of constructing and maintaining the roads, and Congress up to now has gone no further than to furnish "expert advice." My friend from Tennessee [Mr. GAINES] asked a few moments ago how the Government furnishes this "expert advice," and I will answer that question by citing an individual instance as an example. Several years ago a distinguished civil engineer in my district, Major Dabney, asked the Office of Public Roads to make an experiment in burning a road in his county which ran over what we call "buckshot clay."

In some parts of the country it is called "gumbo," and many of you are familiar with it by that name. It is a very stiff and sticky clay, and in the dry seasons it makes an ideal road, never becoming dusty. When the winter rains set in, however, these buckshot roads become practically impassable. In the Delta country of the Mississippi there are many large areas composed of this buckshot, and the problem of road making becomes a most serious one. There is no stone or rock there, and for that reason to build macadam roads would involve such heavy expense as to make it altogether impracticable. Well, in pursuance of this request the Office sent Mr. Spoon, one of the most expert and competent road engineers in the country, to look into the matter. He secured types of this buckshot and analyzed it in the laboratory and subjected it to high temperatures and concluded that the test was worth making. Accordingly he went to Mississippi and burned a section of a road several hundred yards long and at the same time constructed a gravel road of about the same length. The local authorities, of course, paid all the expense, the Government simply furnishing the "expert advice;" that is, the expert from the Office supervised the work. That experiment proved so successful that the local authorities began a campaign for better roads, and the county issued $100,000 in bonds for that purpose, and I noticed in a local paper a few days ago the statement that they had spent in the past three years $200,000 on their roads, which are now the best in the Delta. Last summer the Office sent Mr. Spoon to Washington County, another county in my district, to make another experiment in this buckshot burning, and this has proven entirely successful also. I drove over this road in January last when the other roads were wet and muddy, and it was with difficulty that I could get over many parts of the road leading to the portion that had been burned, but that section of it, perhaps a half mile in length, was in perfect condition. I have some letters from people living near this road which I shall print in the RECORD, and which tell of the complete success of the experiment after the hard test of the past winter. One of the letters is from the mayor of Greenville, which is quite near to this road, and he says that the cost of keeping it in perfect condition to date has been $7.

OFFICE OF WILLIAM YERGER, MAYOR,
Greenville, Miss., March 14, 1908.

Hon. B. G. HUMPHREYS,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I replied yesterday to your telegram of the 11th instant, asking condition of burnt road. I made a careful inspection of this road and found the road in perfect condition, hard and firm, with no indication of giving away. This is an ideal road to-day. As you know, I have taken great interest in this experiment. I have had the road rounded up with an Austin road grader and rolled once since its completion and have had the very few wagon ruts that have appeared filled with burnt buckshot. I have expended about $7 in this work. As you know, the heaviest traffic on our roads is during the fall and winter, when the cotton crop is being marketed, and this road has stood the test.

Yours, truly, W. YERGER.

GREENVILLE, MISS., March 14, 1908.

Hon. B. G. HUMPHREYS,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Knowing the interest you have taken in our recent experiment of burnt buckshot road building, I thought you would like to know how it had stood the test up to date. As you know, I had charge of the labor during its construction and have, since its completion, watched the road to strengthen, if it was necessary, any weak points that might appear. I have at three different times during the winter run our grader over the line, keeping the center filled and rounded up. The cost of this work would not, I should say, exceed six or seven dollars. The road at this date is perfectly smooth and is thoroughly cemented. I am told that on account of the almost impassable condition of the old Wilczinski road, over which the Metcalfe neighborhood does its hauling to town, that much of this hauling has been diverted to our road, which means an additional strain and further test. My opinion is that the experiment is a success.

Yours, truly,

ALBERT S. OLIN, Street Supervisor.

GREENVILLE, MISS., March 15, 1908.

Hon. B. G. HUMPHREYS, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: I have been repeatedly asked regarding the condition of the burnt road east of town, and it has been suggested that I ought to write to you regarding it. I possibly travel over this road more than anyone else, and have been using it constantly from the time it was completed. It has had a very severe test this winter, as we have had a very open winter, with very heavy rains, and the road has been in perfect condition all the time; in fact, the road has had more travel than usual this winter, as a great deal of cotton was brought in this way just to get the benefit of the haul over this road.

The road has been kept in repair with almost no work or expense at all, and is to-day smooth and firm, and everything that a good road, I should say a perfect road, ought to be, and it is certainly a great object lesson to the people here, as beyond this the roads have been all but impassable for months.

Very sincerely, yours, W. G. STIMMEL.

An experiment was made in this burnt buckshot in Sunflower County last summer, and for some reason it did not prove successful. Another expert will be sent to look that over during the coming summer, however, and I believe it will yet be made a success.

Mr. SIMS. What is the cost of this burning process you are speaking of?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. That depends, of course, upon the cost of the fuel. If the road is through a wooded country where wood can be had for, say $1.25 a cord the road can be made for $1,500 a mile.

Mr. SIMS. How much wood is required to burn a mile?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. To burn a road 14 feet wide it will require between seven and eight hundred cords. That necessarily varies, of course, as the moisture in the soil to be burned varies. To make a comparative statement, I will say that it costs from one-half to one-fifth what a macadam road costs and is as easily and as cheaply maintained. In a country where the people have never gone into the building of good roads the thought of paying $2,000 a mile for a good road seems prohibitive. Where the experiment is once made, however, we all know that the people, and especially the farmers, who usually are at first the most violently opposed to the undertaking, demand that the roads be constructed and are most willing to bear the tax. As a rule the rate of taxation has to be increased an almost infinitesimally small degree to meet the new demands. For instance, in my own county in Mississippi there are, in round numbers, 10,000 men subject to road duty, and a road tax of $3 each would pay the interest at 6 per cent on a half a million of bonds. This would not involve the payment of any additional property tax whatever, and would construct a system of good roads for the county that would add immeasurably to the comfort of the public and to the values of all rural property. The truth is that no road can cost the farmer as much as a bad one. If instead of hauling six bales of cotton, as could be done with ease by two mules over the burnt road near Greenville any day during the past winter, he can only haul two, he is being taxed for a bad road at a higher rate than anybody was ever taxed for a good road, not counting the wear and tear of mules and wagon. I have seen seed cotton in the pens in July which had been picked after the rains had begun to fall in the previous winter, and which had not been hauled out to the railroad, where the gin was located, because the roads were too bad to travel. Think of the tax that man was paying, and that, too, for a road he could not travel.

There is another method of improving clay roads in which the Office gives "expert advice," which they describe very fully in this bulletin, which is issued by the Department of Agriculture as Bulletin No. 27 of the Office of Public Roads.

Mr. RUSSELL of Missouri. What is the pamphlet you refer to?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. It is called the "Construction of Sand-Clay and Burnt-Clay Roads," and is written by Mr. Spoon, of the Office of Public Roads. It is issued as a bulletin, and is sent out on request of anybody who is interested enough in the subject to write and ask for it. It describes in detail the method of constructing the burnt roads I have just spoken of and the sand-clay roads also. The process of constructing these roads is simply to haul sand to a clay road or to haul clay to a sand road, as the case may be. The mixing or "puddling," as it is called, must of course be done by an expert who understands his business, so that the proportions of sand and clay may be properly adjusted. This is a very much cheaper process than the burning, the cost being from $300 to $600 a mile. Some of the best rural roads in this country have been made by this process. Now, under this paragraph which provides for "expert advice" these roads are constructed in exactly the same manner and under the same conditions as the road I have just told of in Mississippi. The local authorities furnish the money for the experiment and the Government furnishes the expert to advise them and really to supervise the building of the demonstration road, until they learn how themselves.

I can not, of course, give all the different ways in which the Office is furnishing "expert advice" to the local authorities, but I do want to mention just one more, and I believe it illustrates the thoroughly practical work of the Office and the great service which the people are receiving from it. I refer now to the latest bulletin gotten out by Mr. Page, who is one of the most competent men in the service of the Government and ought to be the chief of a bureau instead of the director of an office. It is issued as Farmers' Bulletin No. 321, and is written by Mr. King on the "Use of the Split-Log Drag on Earth Roads." It is an account of the simplest, cheapest, and yet the most useful and effective implement for the improvement of earth roads ever invented. If I can get the consent of the Committee on Printing I shall put into the RECORD a cut of this drag, a mere glance at which will enable any practical farmer to make one. In some States the farmers by common agreement drag the road along their own fronts after every rain, and the results are almost unbelievable. I have seen its workings myself both on country roads and on the streets of small towns where there was no paving, and I wish to commend in the strongest terms the wisdom of the director in getting up this bulletin and sending it out as a public document. This drag is particularly effective in buckshot or gumbo. I have some letters here which I shall print in my remarks, which I take from a most instructive article on the "Split-Log Drag," written by Mr. Henry Wallace, editor of Wallace's Farmer:

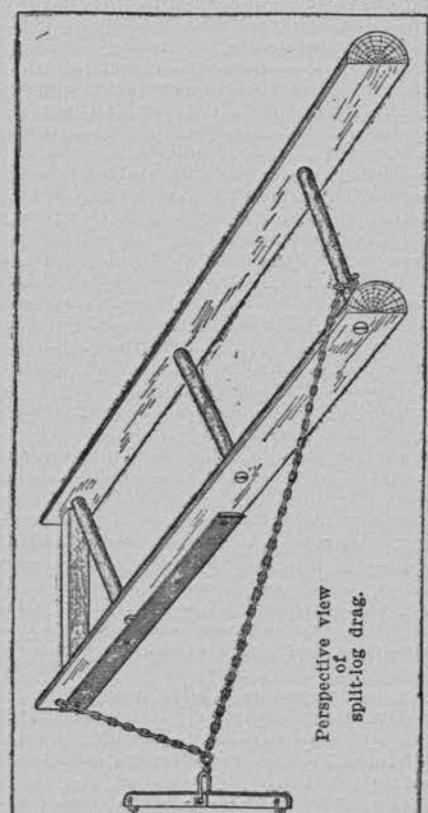
SOME PRACTICAL EXPERIENCE.

To the testimony of the photographs we might add any amount of testimony from farmers in Missouri and other States who have used the drag. For example, F. M. Joslyn, editor of the Missouri Mail, writes to George B. Ellis, secretary of the Missouri State board of agriculture with regard to the bottomless roads on the Missouri bottom:

"I wish to say that for several years I lived in the Missouri bottoms in Atchison County, and was frequently obliged to travel the road from my farm to the county seat, some 7 or 8 miles. Nothing but the most emphatic language and the latest improved epithets could do justice to the condition of the roads, especially during the winter and spring months. Frequently three or four hours were required to make the trip, and a spade was necessary to clean the gumbo from the wheels.

"During the latter part of March in this year (1903) I was visiting in Atchison County and one afternoon Mr. J. T. Johnson, of Rockport, the county seat of Atchison, proposed driving me over to the old farm where I formerly lived. He hitched one horse to a buggy, and at a time when the roads there should have been almost impassable and the other roads in the bottom actually terrible, but we drove on a trot the entire distance without a break.

"When we struck the bottom the beautiful, smooth appearance of the road, slightly elevated in the center, slightly sloping at the sides, and as smooth as a floor, struck me as something out of the ordinary. Mr. Johnson informed me that a public-spirited farmer had dragged the road in conjunction with some of the neighbors.



"There was no mud in the road, neither was there as much as a pint of water in the roadway from one end of the dragged portion of it to the other. It was a revelation to me and made me a convert of the King system of dragging."

Dr. C. N. Scott, of Mound City, Mo., writes to Mr. Ellis:

"In my practice as a veterinary surgeon I have occasion to travel the gumbo road between here and Bigelow very often. I have been here five years and I never saw that road as good as since they began to drag it. I go there to speed my horses. It is as smooth as a race track. I have many times driven over this 2 miles at a three-minute clip." (This letter is dated November 22, 1902, and after six months of almost continuous rain.)

THE SPLIT-LOG ROAD DRAG.

The only tool necessary is the drag. By the drag we do not mean a harrow, as so many people understand the term, but a drag made of a split log. It is made by taking a straight-grained log from 7 to 9 feet in length and about 10 or 12 inches in diameter. This log is split or sawed lengthwise and the two halves set on edge, 30 inches apart, the flat sides facing forward, and firmly fastened together by three bars made of oak, osage hedge, or other hard wood. The illustration and description beneath it shows how the drag is constructed. The log should be of light timber; box elder, cottonwood, beech, or something of that sort. It is better not to have it of oak. Mr. King says that the best split log drag he ever used was made of red elm. After using the drag for some time it will be found necessary to shoe the front log with a piece of iron three or four inches wide. An old wagon tire makes a good shoe for this purpose. The iron should be put on the right side of the front log and extend not more than three-fifths of its length. It should not project more than a fourth of an inch below the edge of the log. Do not face the entire front log with the iron. The length of the drag can be anywhere from seven to nine feet. The longer it is, the heavier it will pull. One good farm team of horses weighing from 1,100 to 1,200 pounds will handle a seven-foot drag nicely. A heavier team will be required for a heavier drag.

Perspective view of split-log drag.

The cut shows in itself how the drag is constructed. The logs are 7 to 9 feet long and 10 to 12 inches in diameter. They are set on edge, flat side to the front, 30 inches apart and fastened together with three strong pins wedged in. Note particularly the way the hitch is made—the chain running through the center of the log at the right end and over the log (looping around the pin) at the left end; this is important. The point of attachment for the doubletrees depends upon the condition of the road and the work to be done. The farther to the right the hitch is made the greater the angle at which the drag will be drawn. Place a movable cleated platform on the cross pins to stand on when using the drag. You will find by experience that by shifting your weight on the drag you can change the angle and the amount of dirt it will move.

HOW TO USE THE SPLIT-LOG DRAG.

First make it, and have a four-horse evener ready for use the first time. Wait until your roads are very soft, the wetter and softer the better. Then attach four horses. Begin at your front gate, straddle the right-hand rut, and go to your neighbor's front gate in the direction of your nearest market town. Then turn and come back along the other rut. This is enough for the first day; but while you are about it you had better go the whole length of the road along your farm, as well as a portion of your neighbor's. Do not be in a hurry; drive slowly; the slower the better. You can not finish this road in a day. You are simply making a beginning. The effect of this first dragging will be to fill up the ruts with this puddled earth and to make a moderately smooth surface, on which it is possible to make three tracks—one on each side, and one where the old track used to be, in the middle. This smooth surface will shed water, partially at least, and will give free access to the sun and wind, causing it to dry off quicker than the rough surface on either side of the smoothed space. Then wait until it begins to dry off. Take two horses and go over the same track again. This will still further puddle the clay and carry a little more into the middle of the road, which every passing team will both puddle and compact still more.

If it is thought best to widen the road, which it usually is, the best way to do it is to wait until another rain, and then, when it has dried off sufficiently to plow readily, plow one furrow along the outer mark of the drag; take the drag and spread this smoothly over the surface of the road. In this way the road will be widened by the width of the furrow and will gradually become oval—that is, higher in the middle—and each time the drag is used will become a little smoother and a little harder. If the road is still too narrow, plow another furrow, and so on until the road has been widened as much as desired.

It is not only useful on country roads, but in towns where the streets are of buckshot it is equally effective. This is taken from a statement of Mr. Henry Harlow, mayor of Onawa, Iowa:

About a month ago I received word that the Northwestern Railroad would bring D. Ward King to our city. I had heard Mr. King at St. Louis, and when I received the railroad poster, I immediately made a drag, building it precisely as directed. I finished it before noon and put it to work at 1 o'clock on a single block of our main street. The soil is gumbo, and the street was almost impassable, the mud being hub deep in some places.

We put the drag right into the mud and kept it going. At 5 o'clock, just four hours after beginning to use the drag, wagons loaded with 4,000 pounds of baled hay were being drawn over one block and were making a scarcely perceptible rut. But when they went over the crossing the wheels again sank nearly to the hubs in the mud.

I had a good deal of faith in the drag from what I had heard and read, but I was not prepared for such an astonishing change as was made. Our people are all thoroughly convinced that the drag will revolutionize the method of caring for earth roads.

Last fall Mr. Gid Montjoy, sr., the very enterprising street commissioner of the city of Greenwood, in my district, began the use of this split-log drag on the streets of that city. I was there in January and was surprised at the good results which had followed his experiments. Since this bill has been under consideration I wired a prominent physician of that city, asking him how the drag was working, and received this telegram in reply:

Hon. B. G. HUMPHREYS,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.:

Split-log drag as used in Greenwood has brought streets naturally soft and muddy to high state of solidity, supporting trucks and wagons. Produces perfect drainage from center of street to gutters. One treatment after each rain sufficient, drying streets very rapidly.

D. S. HUMPHREYS.

Mr. Chairman, in view of the fact that the discussion had taken a rather wider scope than was altogether pertinent to this paragraph, I thought it desirable to confine my remarks more closely to the provisions of the bill itself and to explain somewhat the actual workings of the Office. The subject of good roads is a very interesting one, and one that is of tremendous importance to all of our people. The cost of bad roads, of roads that can only be used when weather conditions are favorable, is appalling. All the world is ahead of us in this particular. We are properly and wisely devoting much of our time to the discussion of the question of transportation, both by rail and water. We are providing at great expense the machinery necessary to administer the rate-regulation laws which we are passing from time to time, and we are spending millions annually upon our waterways. All this is well, but we ought not to forget that of the inland traffic of the United States, which in its billions exceeds the aggregated international commerce of the world, more than 60 per cent is hauled over our public roads. We are therefore bearing but a small share of the burden when we appropriate $90,000 annually for this purpose, while the States are spending as many millions. I will now ask unanimous consent to print the letters and papers to which I have referred.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I make the same request, including a letter from the city of Redwing, Minn., as part of my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman's remarks are to be confined to this subject of road discussion I shall not make any objection.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Absolutely, a history of this road proposition.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair hears no objection, and it is so ordered.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, from the discussion thus far it is quite apparent that the subject of good roads is a vital one, at least to the major portion of the United Staes, and particularly to the rural sections. It is apparent, however, that some of the older and wealthier States which have heretofore built their roads without any particular governmental aid or advice seem determined that the less fortunate and less populous of the agricultural regions, covering large areas, should do likewise—that is, exclusively at their own expense. The particular subject under discussion deals with the Office of Public Roads as heretofore established in the Department of Agriculture about fifteen years ago, and having for its object to enable the Secretary of Agriculture to make inquiries in regard to systems of road management throughout the United States; to furnish expert advice on road building; to make investigations in regard to the best methods of road making and the best kinds of road-making materials in the several States; to investigate the chemical and physical character of road materials; for the employment of local and special agents, clerks, assistants, and other labor required in the city of Washington and elsewhere; for collating, digesting, reporting, and illustrating the results of such investigations and experiments, and also to enable the Secretary of Agriculture to assist the agricultural colleges and experiment stations in disseminating information on this subject.

Heretofore this Bureau, in connection with the many other useful means of illustrating and disseminating this knowledge, has inaugurated in a large number of instances the very useful and instructive method of engineering the construction of small sections of object-lesson roads, such as macadam, sand-clay, earth roads, and others. In all instances, however, wherever an object-lesson road had been constructed, which is usually limited from one-half a mile to 1 mile in length, the Department has required that the locality desiring this object-lesson road shall furnish the necessary means to pay all expense thereof, except in a few instances where the Department would furnish certain road-making machinery, consisting of a steam roller and occasionally a rock crusher, and an expert engineer to handle the same, and it is now particularly against the furnishing of this machinery by the Government, either by purchase or rent, that the present attack is made by certain Members of the House. The desirability of this method of instruction and the large demand for it is shown in the numerous applications from rural communities which have been made and acceded to in previous years, as well as by those which are now pending.

Before I proceed further I desire to state that from the official records the total sum expended by the Office of Public Roads since its organization up to the present time, in furnishing by purchase, rental, and otherwise, of machinery, by the Government in this object-lesson work is the paltry sum of only $7,000, and that the Government has only purchased three steam rollers altogether, but has rented three others. This certainly shows the economical methods pursued by the Office of Public Roads in the last fifteen years, and certainly does not warrant the statement, which has been frequently made, that the Government is attempting to generally engage in the construction of roads at its expense throughout the United States.

Mr. Chairman, I apprehend that the people at large are not familiar with the origin, purpose, or general working of the present Office of Public Roads, with the struggle that it has had in order to obtain its present efficiency, and I might add that, judging from the remarks that have been made, this lack of knowledge is not confined to the people generally, but might be applied to some of the honorable Members of the House, who have not taken the trouble to investigate the subject. Briefly, I will say that the movement for concerted action on behalf of the public roads prior to the establishment of the Office of Road Inquiry found expression in a bill passed by the Senate of the United States in July, 1892, and favorably reported to the House of Representatives, providing for a National Highway Commission, to be composed of two Senators, five Members of the House of Representatives, and five citizens appointed by the President for the purpose of making a general inquiry into the condition of highways in the United States and means for their improvement. In October of the same year, a National League for Good Roads was formed at Chicago, having the same general purpose, the organization having for its president Hon. Charles F. Manderson, and on its executive committee, Judge E. H. Thayer, Philip D. Armour, Leland Stanford, Clem Studebaker, Samuel W. Allerton, Chauncey B. Ripley, Alexander J. Cassatt, W. Seward Webb, Albert A. Pope, and Charles L. Burdett.

In March, 1893, a petition was presented to Congress asking that a road department similar to the Agricultural Department be founded at Washington for the purpose of promoting the art of constructing and maintaining roads and for teaching students so that they may become skilled road engineers, and to establish a permanent exhibit of sections of road illustrating various methods of construction and the best road materials and machinery. This petition was signed by the governors of many of the States, including Governor McKinley, of Ohio, and the chambers of commerce in many of the cities, including Los Angeles, Seattle, Milwaukee, Jacksonville, Boston; and by universities, including the University of Georgia, University of Louisiana, Cornell University, Franklin Institute; and indorsed by resolutions of legislatures, including the Massachusetts house of representatives.

The Office of Road Inquiry was established under authority of an act of Congress, approved March 3, 1893, making appropriation for the Department of Agriculture. The clause relating to this work provided that the Secretary of Agriculture should make inquiries in regard to systems of road management throughout the United States, make investigations in regard to the best methods of road making, prepare publications on this subject, and assist agricultural colleges and experiment stations in disseminating information on this subject. The appropriation was $10,000.

During the next two fiscal years the appropriations and the wording of the bill remained the same. The appropriation for the fiscal year 1897 was reduced to $8,000, and a provision was added authorizing the investigation of road-making materials in the several States. The appropriation remained $8,000 annually during the fiscal years 1898, 1899, and 1900, and no change was made in the wording of the bill, although the name of the office was changed from "Road Inquiry" to "Public Road Inquiries" in the fiscal year 1899.

The agricultural bill for 1901 carried an appropriation for $14,000, and provided for conducting experiments in the city of Washington and elsewhere, and collating, digesting, reporting, and illustrating the results of such experiments. The appropriation for 1902 was $20,000, and the bill provided for the investigation of the chemical and physical character of road materials. The language of the appropriation bills has remained practically unchanged up to the present time, except that the name of the office was changed from "Public Road Inquiries" to the "Office of Public Roads" and a statutory organization was provided in the agricultural bill approved March 3, 1905. The following is a table of the appropriations to the fiscal year 1908, inclusive:

Appropriations for public road inquiries from 1893–94 to 1907–8.

1894–95	10,000
1895–96	10,000
1896–97	8,000
1897–98	8,000
1898–99	8,000
1899–1900	8,000
1900–1901	14,000
1901–2	20,000
1902–3	30,000
1903–4	35,000
1904–5	35,000
1905–6	50,000
1906–7	70,000
Total	386,050

Since its establishment the Office has issued 32 bulletins, 88 circulars, 5 farmers' bulletins, 19 yearbook reprints, and 14 annual reports, a total of 158 publications. It has directed the construction of 145 object-lesson roads in 34 States, illustrating macadam, brick, gravel, sand-clay, shell, and earth construction, in addition to roads of an experimental character. The approximate expenditure on these object-lesson roads by local authorities has been $500,000, and the subsequent road work due directly to the object-lesson roads undoubtedly represents expenditures running well up into millions. Lectures and personal advice by engineers and experts have constituted a prominent feature of the work of this Office since its establishment. The road-material laboratory was installed December, 1900, and from that time to February 20, 1908, 2,478 samples of road material have been received from practically every State in the Union and tested to determine their character and value for road building.

Experiments have been conducted in the burning of clay, or gumbo, for building roads in districts where hard material is lacking. These experiments have proven successful and may result in practically solving the road problem in large areas of the country.

Experiments have been conducted with oils, tar, rock, asphalt, and various preparations for the purpose of preventing dust and preserving macadam roads from destruction under modern traffic conditions. At present the Office is arranging to conduct investigations to determine the feasibility of the sand-clay method of road building in the prairie States, the use of slag as a road material, the construction of roads of natural soils by treatment with asphaltic oils, and the improvement of sand roads in parts of the country where clay is not accesssible. Practical efforts have been made toward bringing about the more general use of the split-log drag in the maintenance of earth roads.

Under a cooperative arrangement with the Geological Survey, entered into in February of this year, road materials are being investigated in the various States, and physical tests made in the laboratory of this Office to determine their value as road materials, these results to be published in the form of joint bulletins.

Graduates in engineering are appointed from colleges each year after a competitive examination, and are given thorough training while rendering practical services to the Government. In this way an efficient corps of engineers is being built up, which will aid the development of road building along proper lines, both during and after their connection with the Government service. This work was begun in the fiscal year 1905.

Investigations into the decomposition of rock powders under the action of water have led to important discoveries with reference to increasing the cementing value of road materials. The investigation into the corrosion of iron and steel culverts has brought out important results. The generally accepted theories regarding the rusting of iron have been demonstrated to be incorrect, and it has been shown that by treating the surface of the iron with a strong oxidizing agent the rusting can be inhibited.

In May, 1907, the Office inaugurated a project designed to introduce the best possible systems of construction, maintenance, and administration of roads in the various counties. Under this plan, engineers are assigned to make thorough investigation on all phases of the road work of the county to which they are assigned and prepare exhaustive reports giving plans, estimates, and recommendations.

The number of the employees of the Office has increased from 1 on July 1, 1893, to 56 on July 1, 1907. It should be borne in mind that the present appropriation of the Office is $70,050, out of which $2,000 is paid for rent, leaving $68,050 to pay the salaries of these 56 employees, as well as traveling expenses, the purchase of equipment and supplies, and the usual running expenses.

Since July 1, 1905, the most thorough and systematic methods of organization have been introduced into the administration of the Office, each and every employee is given specific duties to perform, a careful system of reports and records is kept of work done and expenditures made on every project, the most approved system of filing is in use, and a library has been formed, comprising unquestionably the best and most complete collection of periodicals, manuscripts, pamphlets, and books on all phases of road work to be found in the Western Hemisphere, and this library is being added to constantly. Thirty-nine periodicals are regularly received, of which 15 are donated.

The policy of the Office in recent years has been to cooperate with the officials in charge of road work in the various States as closely as possible, and the endeavor is being made to so correlate road work in each State by voluntary cooperation as to constitute one great movement along uniform lines and make the progress and methods of each State known to every other State through the medium of this Office. In furtherance of this object a comprehensive investigation was begun early in 1905 to ascertain the mileage of improved and unimproved roads, the character of improvement, the amounts expended, rates of levy, and sources of revenue in every county in the United States. This work was finished in June, 1907, and the results published in the form of a bulletin, which shows that there are over 2,100,000 miles of road in the United States, of which only 7.14 per cent were improved in 1904, and that the expenditure in money and labor for that year was nearly $80,000,000. This bulletin comprises the first complete data ever assembled on this subject.

Now, Mr. Chairman, if the Office of Public Roads is prohibited from hereafter purchasing or leasing any road machinery whatever, in carrying out what I consider to be the legitimate work of the Bureau, the object-lesson road work in the future will be greatly curtailed, if not almost entirely eliminated. I find, upon investigating the reports and records of the Office of Public Roads, that by far the most effective work under the object-lesson method has been in counties which did not possess any road-building machinery prior to the object-lesson instruction. Many counties which now have excellent systems of highways started with an object-lesson road built with Government machinery. Those sections of country which have not progressed in road building have profited and are profiting by the object-lesson method.

Mr. Chairman, I desire, in this connection, to have read and included in my remarks a letter which I recently received from the Red Wing Manufacturers' Association, of Red Wing, Minn.:

RED WING MANUFACTURERS' ASSOCIATION,
Red Wing, Minn., February 27, 1908.

Hon. C. R. DAVIS, M. C., Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: The Red Wing Manufacturers' Association have appointed the writer as a committee to take up with you the question of securing the cooperation of the Department of Agriculture in building an object-lesson road out of Red Wing this season. The city council has already passed a resolution to appropriate money necessary for the purpose, and have the funds on hand to build a mile of road, or such part thereof as may seem desirable by the Department.

The members of our association, as well as the citizens of Red Wing, as a whole are very much interested in securing favorable action by the Department in this matter, and trust you will use your best efforts to secure the same.

Thanking you very much for your prompt attention to our request and assuring you that such action will be thoroughly appreciated by every member of the association, I am,

Yours, truly,
W. R. PUTNAM.

Since the receipt of this letter I am informed that the city of Red Wing has appropriated the sum of $3,000 for the construction of an object-lesson road extending from this city of Red Wing into the rural portion of the county, and that formal application has been made to the Office of Public Roads for their aid in this construction. Now, Mr. Chairman, if the prohibitive clause in this bill is retained I am informed that it will require the abandonment of plans for work in rural communities in almost all sections of the country, including Red Wing and Redwood Falls, Minn.; various points in North Dakota; Boise, Idaho; Stockton, Cal.; various points in Nebraska; Emporia, Kans.; points in Missouri, Oklahoma, Arkansas; Kosciusko and other points in Mississippi; points in Alabama and Georgia; Sumter, S. C.; points in North Carolina, Tennessee; Philipi, W. Va.; and several points in Indiana and Pennsylvania.

The instruction of engineer students, which has become an established and successful feature of the work of the Office of Public Roads, is much more thorough and efficient as a result of the ownership or control of road machinery by the Government, as these young engineers are taught not only mechanical features in the operation of various items of machinery, but learn all about loading and unloading machinery, setting up the plant, and superintending its operation.

Without a modification of this prohibitive clause, the Office of Public Roads would be prevented from incurring any expense in designing, constructing, or improving special apparatus or equipment which might prove of incalculable advantage to the people of the United States in solving some road problems. As an example of this, it might be mentioned that in the experiments for dust prevention and the preservation of macadam roads equipment for applying special materials and preparations is of the utmost importance, and the Office of Public Roads is conducting investigations with a view to perfecting and improving such equipment. Certainly every facility should be given for working out all phases of every road problem, whether it applies to road management, road construction, maintenance, equipment, materials, or special investigation. The amount involved is trivial. The Director of the Office of Public Roads informs me that this prohibitive clause in the pending agricultural bill will not curtail the work of the Office of Public Roads in general, as its field of usefulness is so broad, and that he has so stated his position to the Committee on Agriculture. He states, however, that this clause will undoubtedly curtail the object-lesson road work and make necessary the canceling of many of his plans for such work in counties which undoubtedly need it.

I trust, Mr. Chairman, that the Members of this Congress will not allow this prohibitive clause to remain in the bill, but strike it out and thus enable the Office of Public Roads to proceed unhampered with the good work in which it is now engaged.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I will ask to have the amendment reported again.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be again reported.

There was no objection, and the Clerk again reported the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and on a division (demanded by Mr. CRAWFORD) there were—ayes 57, noes 138.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Chairman, I demand tellers.

The CHAIRMAN. As many as are in favor of demanding tellers will rise and stand until counted. [After counting.] Two gentlemen have arisen, not a sufficient number, and tellers are refused.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. Chairman, I have a bona fide amendment, and the gentleman's amendment is a mere formal amendment. Which has precedence?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair can not distinguish between the two amendments. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from New York.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman, this proposition of good road building is a live question, and will continue to be a matter of much concern to all the people of the country until it is settled and settled right. I take a deep and an abiding interest in the matter and have given it considerable study. I was very much impressed with all that was said in the House yesterday and to-day for and against the proposition of Government aid to good road building. In the last Congress I introduced a bill for Government aid to good road building, and I reintroduced the same bill in this Congress. It is in the pigeonholes of the Committee on Agriculture, and I can not get it reported. I believe if the Committee on Agriculture had reported this bill of mine, it would have gone far to solve the problem of good road building and made much of this discussion unnecessary. I send this bill to the Clerk's desk and ask to have it read in my time, so that it may be printed in the RECORD as a part of my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the bill in the time of the gentleman from New York.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (16627) to promote the construction of good roads and the efficiency of the postal service in the States and Territories of the United States.

Be it enacted, etc., That upon the application of the proper authorities representing any State or Territory of the United States, the Secretary of the Treasury shall loan to such State or Territory for the construction or improvement of post-roads within such State or Territory and outside the limits of any city or incorporated village the actual cost of such construction or improvement: Provided, That the construction or improvement of said post-roads shall be under the general supervision of the Post-Office Department and according to specifications approved by it, and the Postmaster-General is hereby authorized and directed to make all needful rules and regulations relating thereto: Provided further, That one twenty-fifth part of all money received from the United States Government under the provisions of this act shall be each year returned to the Treasury of the United States by the State or Territory receiving the same until the whole amount received by such State or Territory shall have been returned.

SEC. 2. That no interest shall be charged upon money loaned under the provisions of this act when return to the Treasury is promptly made as provided for by this act, but a 5 per cent per annum interest charge shall be added to all deferred payments. And the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to make all necessary arrangements with the States and Territories with respect to said loan.

SEC. 3. That the President is directed to cause to be laid before Congress, as soon as convenience will permit after the commencement of each session, a statement of all proceedings under this act.

SEC. 4. That this act shall take effect immediately.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman, that bill speaks for itself, and is a simple, comprehensive, and constitutional measure for Government aid in good-road building. It is the first proposition of its kind that has ever been introduced in Congress, and if it became a law it would promote the general welfare, not take one dollar in its last analysis out of the Federal Treasury, and yet it would aid the State that can not now afford to appropriate the money. The money loaned the States would all be returned to the Government, and in twenty-five years we would have the best roads in the world. We loan money to the national banks, then why not to the States to build good roads that will directly or indirectly benefit all the people? To-day there is deposited by the Government over $200,000,000 of the people's money in the national banks, not drawing a dollar's interest, and benefiting no one except the stockholders of the national banks. If some of this money were loaned the States to build good roads, as contemplated in my bill, it would give employment to thousands and thousands of honest workmen now idle, promote prosperity, and ere long secure for all the people splendid national highways.

Now, I heard the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] say yesterday that the State of New York was spending $50,000,000—$5,000,000 annually—to build good roads. That is true, and I am glad to say that I did all I could to bring it about. It is money well spent and will redound in material benefits to the credit of the Empire State. But there are States which can not afford to appropriate money to build these good roads, and I am broad-minded enough, and I am liberal-spirited enough to do all in my power as a Member of the National Legislature to have the Federal Government aid the less fortunate States. In this matter of good-road building what benefits one State will benefit all the other States. This bill of mine will do this and will also avoid the constitutional objection, if such there be, to which reference was made this morning by my colleague from New York [Mr. HARRISON]. My bill will aid all the States to construct good roads, to put the unemployed men in their own States to work on these roads, and the maintenance and care of the roads will at all times be a State matter, pure and simple, thus avoiding every objection on account of doubtful constitutionality or centralization of power.

Mr. Chairman, I represent on the floor of this House a great district in the very heart of the city of New York—a great patriotic people, of whom I am justly proud—but I am farseeing enough to realize that what will help one part of our country will benefit every other section of our land, and I deprecate the narrow view of that is often expressed concerning the local character of this important question of good-road building. It is not local or sectional. It is national in all its aspects; it is for the public weal; it will promote the general welfare, and the Government should give its legislative sanction to the project and render all the aid within its power.

Good roads, sir, are the arteries of the industrial life of a great and powerful people. In a Government such as ours all sorts and conditions of men and women are more or less absolutely dependent upon the best and speediest means of communication and transportation. If you say good roads will only help the farmers, I deny it. The farmers who produce the necessaries of life are less dependent than the millions and millions of people who live in our cities and towns. The most superficial investigation of this subject will clearly prove that good roads are just as important to the consumers, if not more so, than they are to the producers of the country.

The burdens of life fall hardest on the farmer. The least the Government can do for him is to help him get decent highways. I am with the farmers in this fight for good roads. I am with the rural districts of our land in their struggle for better transportation facilities, and in Congress or out of Congress I shall do all in my power to hasten the consummation they desire—the ability to go and come along decent roads without exhausting the time and the effort and the utility of man and beast. I know farm life. My boyhood days were spent on a farm doing farm work. I know the farmer's joys and sorrows—his trials and his troubles, and I know that we owe much to the farmers and producers of our country—much that we can never repay. Whatever will aid them will benefit the people in every community.

The fathers of the Republic wisely recognized the importance of this question. Washington and Jefferson advocated good roads and projected the construction of a great highway from the Capital to the Mississippi Valley. The farseeing statesmen of the early days of our national existence championed and passed measures to better the means of transportation. They knew that of all human agencies the one which has done most for humanity and civilization has been the building of good roads—the abridgment of distance in the facility of communication. They realized the necessity of good roads—how important they were to the country—to its growth and its development, and to mankind, morally, physically, intellectually, and industrially, removing national and provincial antipathies and binding together all the branches of the great human family.

The farsighted wisdom of Julius Cæsar built from the imperial exchequer the magnificent roads that led in all directions to eternal Rome. The great Napoleon—Cæsar like—built the roads of France that center in Paris from the general funds of the Government, and these French roads have done more than any other single agency to encourage the thrift and increase the industry and insure the contentment of the people of France. Cæsar and Napoleon were the great road builders of ancient and modern times, and their foresight and their judgment demonstrated the beneficent results that follow, as the night the day, the construction of governmental highways.

Sir, the people of the country know the importance of good road building. They are familiar with the truths of history. They know the past. They realize that often the difference between good roads and bad roads is the difference between profit and loss. Good roads have a money value far beyond our ordinary conception. Bad roads constitute our greatest drawback to internal development and material progress. Good roads mean prosperous farmers; bad roads mean abandoned farms, sparsely settled country districts, and congested populated cities, where the poor are destined to become poorer. Good roads mean more cultivated farms and cheaper food products for the toilers in the towns; bad roads mean poor transportation, lack of communication, high prices for the necessaries of life, the loss of untold millions, and idle workmen seeking employment. Good roads will help those who cultivate the soil and feed the multitude, and whatever aids the producers of our country will increase our wealth and our greatness and benefit all the people of the land. We can not destroy our farms without general decay and final deterioration. They are to-day the heart of our national life and the chief source of our material greatness. Tear down every edifice in our towns and labor will rebuild them, but abandon the farms and our cities will crumble away and disappear forever.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to say again that I take an abiding interest in this all-absorbing question for better highways throughout the land by some plan of governmental assistance. I am for the cause, and in the fight to stay. I am now, always have been, and always will be, a friend of good-road building. It means progress and prosperity, a benefit to the people who live in the cities, an advantage to the people who live in the country, and it will help every section of our vast domain. Good roads, like good streets, make habitation along them most desirable; they enhance the value of farm lands, facilitate transportation, and add untold wealth to the producers and consumers of the country; they are the milestones marking the advance of civilization; they economize time and labor and money; they save wear and tear and worry and waste; they beautify the country, bring it in touch with the city, and aid the social and religious and educational and industrial progress of the people; they make better homes and happier hearthsides; they are the avenues of trade, the highways of commerce, the mail routes of information, and the agencies of speedy communication; they mean the economical transportation of marketable products—the maximum burden at the minimum cost; they are the ligaments that bind the country together in thrift and industry and intelligence and patriotism; they promote social intercourse, prevent intellectual stagnation, and increase the happiness and the prosperity of our producing masses; they contribute to the glory of the country, give employment to our idle workmen, distribute the necessaries of life—the products of the fields and the forests and the factories—encourage energy and husbandry, inculcate love for our scenic wonders, and make mankind better and greater and grander. Good roads have made the glory of the nations of the past, and good roads will add to our greater glory and make us all that we hope to be, the most beneficent power that ever blessed progressive humanity.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas offers an amendment.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this paragraph and on all amendments thereto close in ten minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas moves that all debate upon this paragraph and the amendments thereto close in ten minutes.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced the ayes seemed to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. WILLIAMS) there were—ayes 96, noes 61.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, let us have tellers on this proposition.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. If you keep on chopping off debate over there, we will keep this up for a year, and on this very important question, too.

The question was again taken, and the tellers [Mr. SCOTT and Mr. WILLIAMS] reported that there were—ayes 106, noes 65.

So the motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by inserting after the word "State," in line 24, page 43, the following:

"To cooperate with the Post-Office Department in suggesting methods for maintenance and improvement of the rural road routes."

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Texas desire to be heard upon the point of order?

Mr. SHEPPARD. Certainly. I introduced a similar amendment during the short session of the last Congress, and the point was raised and the Chair overruled it. I have the page of the RECORD and citation.

Mr. MANN. Well, that ought to be pretty good authority.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Shall I read it, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would like to ask the chairman of the committee as to the point of order.

Mr. SCOTT. The point of order, Mr. Chairman, is, that the cooperation asked for in this amendment is not now authorized by law. If it were, I do not concede that there would be any point in the amendment. Certainly it must be a change of existing law.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. Chairman, there is no law on the subject at all, and if the gentleman desired to raise that point, he ought to have raised the point of order on the whole paragraph.

Mr. SCOTT. May I ask the gentleman from Texas a question? If there is no law upon the subject now at all, does not the gentleman seem to create law?

Mr. SHEPPARD. The entire paragraph was subject to the point of order—that there was no law on the subject—and since you failed to raise the point of order against the paragraph, you can not raise the point of order against an attempt to perfect it. The amendment is something entirely germane to it.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I want to argue the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is prepared to rule.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. We will have the Constitution itself, which empowers Congress to establish post-offices and post-roads, and we have all our rural laws.

The CHAIRMAN. It seems to the Chair that this paragraph was itself subject to the point of order had the point been raised. As the point of order was not made against the paragraph, the Chair holds that this amendment is not subject to the point of order. [Applause on the Democratic side.] The Chair therefore overrules the point of order.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. Chairman, I can not permit to pass unchallenged——

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, may I suggest that the debate on this paragraph had closed?

Mr. SHEPPARD. You said in ten minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. Chairman, I can not permit to pass unchallenged the statement of the gentleman from New York [Mr. HARRISON] that the good-roads bills introduced by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] and others represent a departure from Democratic ideals and traditions. John C. Calhoun, one of the most powerful logicians of all time, whose name will be forever associated with the strictest doctrines of States rights, who regarded with jealousy and opposed with vehemence every unwarranted extension of Federal power, introduced his famous bonus bill in Congress in 1817, setting aside a fund for roads and canals. In a remarkable speech in support of the bill he expressed so felicitously the function and importance of good roads in the United States that a quotation will doubtless be of interest at this stage of the present debate.

The manner—

in which facility and cheapness of intercourse add to the wealth of a nation has been so often and ably discussed by writers on political economy that I presume the House to be perfectly acquainted with the subject. It is sufficient to observe that every branch of national industry—agricultural, manufacturing, and commercial—is stimulated and rendered by it more productive. The result is to diffuse universal opulence. It gives to the interior the advantages possessed by the parts most eligibly situated for trade. It makes the country price, whether in the sale of the raw product or in the purchase of the articles for consumption, approximate to that of commercial towns. In fact, if we look into the nature of wealth we find that nothing can be more favorable to its growth than good roads and canals. Let it not be said that internal improvement may be wholly left to the enterprise of the States and of individuals. I know that much may be justly expected to be done by them, but in a country so new and so extensive as ours there is room enough for all—the General and State governments and individuals—to exert their resources.

Discussing the constitutional phase of the question, Mr. Calhoun held the power of appropriation to be independent of the enumerated powers in the Constitution and capable of application to any general or national purpose. Clay and Webster were in agreement with him. The House amended the bill so as to enable the National Government to exercise rights of eminent domain in connection with the projects involved and to have general superintendence over them. President Monroe vetoed the bill on account of the amendment, conceding that had the bill gone no further than the mere act of appropriation it would have been constitutional. The veto messages of Presidents Madison and Jackson and the veto message of President Monroe on the subject of the Cumberland road, to all of which the gentleman from New York [Mr. HARRISON] alluded in support of his startling proposition, involve practically the same distinction. The bills they vetoed went beyond the mere act of appropriation and endeavored to give the General Government active participation in the construction of certain roadways.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Or their control.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Yes; or their control. I now quote at length from the message of President Jackson, referred to by the gentleman from New York [Mr. HARRISON], in order to show that Jackson considered it settled doctrine that the right of appropriation was not limited by the specified powers of the Constitution:

Independently of the sanction given to appropriations for the Cumberland and other roads and objects under this power the Administration of Mr. Madison was characterized by an act which furnishes the strongest evidence of his opinion of its extent. A bill was passed through both Houses of Congress and presented for his approval, "setting apart and pledging certain funds for constructing roads and canals and improving the navigation of water courses, in order to facilitate, promote, and give security to internal commerce among the several States, and to render more easy and less expensive the means and provisions for the common defense." Regarding the bill as asserting a power in the Federal Government to construct roads and canals within the limits of the States in which they were made, he objected to its passage on the ground of its unconstitutionality, declaring that the assent of the respective States in the mode provided by the bill could not confer the power in question; that the only cases in which the consent and cession of particular States can extend the power of Congress are those specified and provided for in the Constitution, and superadding to these avowals his opinion that "a restriction of the power to 'provide for the common defense and general welfare' to cases which are to be provided for by the expenditure of money would still leave within the legislative power of Congress all the great and most important measures of government, money being the ordinary and necessary means of carrying them into execution." I have not been able to consider these declarations in any other point of view than as a concession that the right of appropriation is not limited by the power to carry into effect the measure for which the money is asked, as was formerly contended.

The views of Mr. Monroe upon this subject were not left to inference. During his Administration a bill was passed through both Houses of Congress conferring the jurisdiction and prescribing the mode by which the Federal Government should exercise it in the case of the Cumberland road. He returned it with objections to its passage, and in assigning them took occasion to say that in the early stages of the Government he had inclined to the construction that it had no right to expend money except in the performance of acts authorized by the other specific grants of power, according to a strict construction of them, but that on further reflection and observation his mind had undergone a change; that his opinion then was "that Congress have an unlimited power to raise money, and that in its appropriation they have a discretionary power, restricted only by the duty to appropriate it to purposes of common defense, and of general, not local, national, not State, benefit." And this was avowed to be the governing principle through the residue of his Administration. The views of the last Administration are of such recent date as to render a particular reference to them unnecessary. It is well known that the appropriating power, to the utmost extent which had been claimed for it in relation to internal improvements, was fully recognized and exercised by it.

This brief reference to known facts will be sufficient to show the difficulty, if not impracticability, of bringing back operations of the Government to the construction of the Constitution set up in 1789, assuming that to be its true reading in relation to the power under consideration, thus giving an admonitory proof of the force of implication and the necessity of guarding the Constitution with sleepless vigilance against the authority of precedents which have not the sanction of its most plainly defined powers; for, although it is the duty of all to look to that sacred instrument instead of the statute book, to repudiate at all times encroachments upon its spirit, which are too apt to be effected by the conjuncture of peculiar and facilitating circumstances, it is not less true that the public good and the nature of our political institutions require that individual differences should yield to a well-settled acquiescence of the people and confederated authorities in particular constructions of the Constitution on doubtful points. Not to concede this much to the spirit of our institutions would impair their stability and defeat the objects of the Constitution itself.

The bill which President Jackson vetoed authorized the Government to become a stockholder in a road company, and the road involved was entirely within the limits of a State. Of course if the Government became a stockholder, it would acquire certain active powers of construction and control, and the bill therefore went distinctly beyond the naked act of appropriation. President Jackson suggested in this message that if the people desired the Federal Government to enter upon the actual work of constructing roads, an amendment of the Constitution would be necessary. Indeed, he favored in this same message a constitutional regulation of the mere act of appropriation with reference to roads in order to secure an equitable division of funds among the States and to confine beyond question the exercise of the function of appropriation within constitutional limits.

Eleven years before the introduction of the Calhoun bonus bill, Thomas Jefferson, the founder of the Democratic party, the father of strict construction, the most watchful guardian of popular rights and constitutional limitations in our political annals, approved a bill appropriating money from the National Treasury for the construction of a road from Cumberland to Wheeling. Jefferson's position is further shown in a letter to Lieper, in 1808, in which he said:

Give us peace until our revenues are liberated from debt. * * * and then during peace we may checker our whole country with canals, roads, etc.

And in a letter to J. W. Eppes, in 1813, in which he said:

The fondest wish of my heart ever was that the surplus portion of the taxes destined for the payment of the Revolutionary debt should, when that object is accomplished, be continued by annual or biennial reenactments and applied in times of peace to the improvement of our country by canals, roads, and useful institutions.

In a letter to Humboldt he said:

It is more remunerative, splendid, and noble to spend money in canals and roads that will build and promote social intercourse and commercial facilities than to expend it in armies and navies.

[Applause.]

The Cumberland-Wheeling road was paid for out of the proceeds of Federal land sales in the States through which it passed. Similar donations were made to Louisiana in 1811, to Indiana in 1816, to Mississippi in 1817, to Illinois in 1818, to Alabama in 1819, to Missouri in 1820, and to Iowa in 1825. Twelve or fifteen great national roads were projected in the early days, with a view to the formation of a great system.

From 1806 to 1838 over $1,600,000 was expended by the National Government for good roads in addition to the Cumberland road, $200,000 being expended in Florida, $286,000 for roads from Detroit to Chicago and elsewhere, and $206,000 for a road from Memphis to a point in Arkansas on the St. Francis River. The Federal Government appropriated funds to be used in the construction of roads long before its power to improve rivers and harbors was admitted or assumed. The situation is the reverse to-day. The advent of the railway diverted attention from road building, and it became the general impression that railways would entirely supplant the common roads. Not until within the last two decades have we recovered from the railway fascination sufficiently to see that dirt roads are as necessary as railroads. The sum of seven millions was appropriated altogether for the maintenance of the Cumberland road. President Monroe vetoed the annual appropriation for the Cumberland road in 1822 on the ground that it went further than the mere expenditure of money and provided for the collection of tolls and the protection of the road by penal laws.

While admitting that Congress had the power to appropriate money for road building in States that had given their consent, President Monroe held that it did not have the power to collect tolls and to police the road independently of the States. Subsequent appropriations were modified accordingly. The Cumberland road was finally surrendered to the States through which it passed; all eyes were centered on the steam engine and the railway.

When we speak of the facilities of modern transportation we have a vision of the fast freight train and think but little of that other vision of the farmer struggling with heavy load and tired team along inferior roads. And yet every pound of produce in the cars must first be carried to the railway on wagon roads. The recent revival of interest in the subject of good roads has found expression in the efforts of Representatives BROWNLOW, CURRIER, WILLIAMS, UNDERWOOD, MOON, CRAWFORD, and many others.

One of the everlasting monuments to the memory of Senator Latimer, of South Carolina, is his work in behalf of good roads. Gentlemen of both parties have introduced bills in this Congress for national aid that have attracted universal attention, bills that do not go further than the mere act of appropriation and that are entirely within the constitutional limits prescribed by Monroe in his famous veto message. They provide a fund from which national donations are made on the application of the States or subdivisions thereof. The Government's authority ceases with the appropriation and the delivery of the money.

It is said that the National Treasury is already overburdened. If this be true, let unnecessary and lavish expenditures cease. The cost of one first-class battle ship would build a thousand miles of first-class macadam road, figuring the cost at $7,000 a mile, or over 3,000 miles of the best gravel roads, placing the cost at $2,000 a mile, roads which would be thronged with traffic long after the battle ship had outlived its usefulness. The sum of $100,000,000 has been appropriated for the Navy in a single year, a sum which, supplemented by a similar amount from the States, would erect nearly 29,000 miles of permanent macadam roadways, nearly one-seventh of the total railway mileage of the United States. Former Congressman Vandiver, of Missouri, has made the calculation that the forty-five States have an average of sixty-one counties each, and that an appropriation of $100,000,000 a year, with a like amount from the States, would in two years build 100 miles of good roads, putting the cost at $1,500 a mile, in every county in the Union. The Government has already expended over $500,000,000 for rivers and harbors—for water roads. It has expended $500,000,000 in a single year on account of the Philippines. It has given enormous land grants to railroads. Our Congresses are expending nearly a thousand millions every year on objects of no greater importance, and on many objects of far smaller importance, than good roads. I have mentioned these amounts for purposes of comparison; the amendment I have introduced does not appropriate an additional dollar.

While this movement for good roads will develop the general wealth to an immense degree, it will especially benefit the rural communities. The farmer contributes 60 per cent of the national appropriations, 90 per cent of which is expended in the cities. The farmer is the basis of national prosperity. The total capital employed in manufacturing in the United States, according to the census of 1900, was nearly ten billions; the total in agriculture nearly twenty billions. We boast of a favorable balance of trade. And yet, if in computing the balances with the world the products of the farm had been omitted, the balance of trade would have been against us at the rate of over fifty millions annually for the last decade and a half. If the farmer thus preserves the prestige of the country, despite the burden of miserable roads, what a mighty figure this country would present with modern methods of rural transportation!

My amendment carries no appropriation. It authorizes the Federal Office of Good Roads to cooperate with the Post-Office Department in suggesting methods for the improvement and maintenance of rural-route roads. Many rural routes have been discontinued on account of impassable roads. If the attention and energy of the Good Roads Office is concentrated particularly upon the rural-route roads, its work will be systematized and rendered far more beneficial to the people. I trust that my amendment will be adopted.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, there is nothing in the present law which excludes the Post-Office Department from taking advantage of all the information that is accumulated by the Office of Public Roads. Not only every citizen, but every department of the Government has that privilege. I can see no possible good, therefore, to be obtained from the passage of this amendment unless it may serve as an entering wedge for the actual construction or improvement by the Government of rural-route roads. Therefore I feel sure that the amendment will be voted down by the good sense of this House. I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from California [Mr. MCLACHLAN.]

Mr. MCLACHLAN of California. Mr. Chairman, on the 30th of March, when this bill was under discussion, my associate from California [Mr. SMITH] made some observations upon this bill which, in my judgment, placed the Forestry Department in a false light.

Some two years ago the city of Los Angeles, which is located in the district that I have the honor to represent, made application here for the right of way to take water from the Owens Valley, situated among the mountains about 120 miles northeast of Los Angeles, and conduct it to that city for domestic and other purposes. That right was given. During the last summer the city of Los Angeles, by a vote of 10 to 1, voted to bond itself in the amount of $23,000,000 to carry out this project.

A forest reserve, known as the Sierra National Reserve, is located along the western boundaries of Owens Valley. Subsequently the authorities of Los Angeles located a line for an aqueduct to conduct this water through and from Owens Valley to the city of Los Angeles, and in order to have that line protected and the water conserved and kept uncontaminated, requested the President of the United States to withdraw from settlement certain lands along the eastern boundary of the said reservation that would include this aqueduct and the river through that valley. An application was made in January, 1907, for the extension of this reservation to include these lands. That was acted upon by the President, who temporarily withdrew the public land along said route from settlement in February, 1907.

My colleague [Mr. SMITH], in describing this transaction on the floor the other day, contended that the Forestry Department was attempting to extend its forest reserves in this particular without justice or without cause. The gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. POLLARD] stated on the floor of this House that he had just called upon Forester Pinchot, who stated that he urged that such action be taken, at the request of the California delegation. The delegation then present in the House—Messrs. NEEDHAM, KNOWLAND, and ENGLEBRIGHT—were asked if they had made any such request, and stated that they had not been to the Department to make such a request of the Forester. It transpires now that every member of the California delegation, including both Senators, with the exception of Mr. NEEDHAM, Mr. SMITH, and Mr. KAHN, had written to the President of the United States asking that this territory in question be permanently included within said Sierra Reserve, and that the United States Forester, Mr. Pinchot, was acting in accordance with the specific request of a majority of the California delegation in Congress.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SMITH of California. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. All debate has expired.

Mr. SMITH of California. I ask unanimous consent that I may be permitted to make a statement in addition to that made by the gentleman from Los Angeles——

Mr. WILLIAMS. Regular order!

Mr. SMITH of California. This raises somewhat a question of veracity.

The CHAIRMAN. Regular order is called for.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I called for the regular order in view of the vote taken a little while ago.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the adoption of the amendment of the gentleman from Texas.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Division!

The committee divided, and there were—ayes, 45; noes, 82.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. COOK of Colorado. I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. All debate upon this paragraph and amendments thereto is closed, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Total for Office of Public Roads, $87,390.

Mr. COOK of Colorado. I move to strike out the last word. Mr. Speaker, on page 291 of the hearings before the Committee on Agriculture, in reply to my question, Mr. Pinchot said the receipts of the Forestry Bureau for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1907, were:

For grazing fees	$863,000
For timber sales	603,000

while the expenditure of the Forestry Bureau for the same time was $1,530,000, or $64,000 in excess of the receipts. Mr. Pinchot has stated publicly the receipts of his Bureau were slightly in excess of the receipts for the year, which does not agree with the statement made by the gentleman before the Committee on Agriculture.

Mr. Pinchot, in his statement before the Committee on Agriculture, estimated the receipts of his Bureau for the coming fiscal year at $2,000,000. This estimate is unreasonably high. As I stated to our committee, on page 292 of the hearings, there is now and has been for some months a large falling off in the consumption of lumber and mining timber, and cited that prior to the late financial trouble an average of fifty cars per day was consumed at Leadville, mostly for square sets and props in the mines, but owing to our largest silver, lead, zinc, and copper mines being closed down, owing to the low price of metals, the consumption was at present quite small.

Without the least reservation, Mr. Speaker, I say, and challenge Mr. Pinchot to deny the statement, our mines and mills in Colorado, for the reasons hereinbefore stated, are using less than 50 per cent of timber for the past four months, as compared with December, 1906, January, February, and March of 1907, and December, 1907, January, February, and March, 1908, with no immediate prospect of the price of metals advancing. Therefore the mines will remain closed. The conditions in Colorado as to silver, lead, and zinc mining are worse now than in the year 1893.

Mr. Speaker, the Members of this House have no conception of the conditions which the citizens of Colorado and the entire Rocky Mountain region have to endure under the arbitrary and dictatorial management of the Forest Bureau.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. COOK of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I ask for three or four minutes more. I have not been heard much on this floor, and I ask for a few minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Colorado asks unanimous consent for four minutes more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SCOTT. I move that debate close in five minutes on this question.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. COOK of Colorado. You may be surprised, gentlemen, when I say that in the Leadville Forest Reserve the average cost of mining timber and lumber from the Forest Bureau is $5 per thousand feet. This is a most unreasonable tax upon our people.

Mr. Pinchot, claiming the right to make any price he sees fit, has recently charged as high as $2.60 per thousand feet for timber located on the main Continental Divide of the Rocky Mountains, at an elevation of 11,000 feet. In addition to this charge the buyer is required to pile the brush and construct wagon roads at his own expense, the wages of the men for this labor being $50 per month and board. You must understand, gentlemen, that to reach this timber the topography of the country could not be worse.

Another arbitrary ruling by the Forestry Bureau is that our people are required to remove this timber in one year. You can all readily understand that in that high elevation of a rough and mountainous country they require to have snow on the ground in order to move the timber. Sometimes there is not sufficient snow and at other times there is too much. Now, what we want in Colorado, in the management of the Forest Bureau, is less sentiment and more practicability, less Harvard graduates and rough riders, and some practical lumber and mill men who know something about the business from experience, and that the Forestry Bureau shall comply strictly with the law. [Applause.]

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Is the debate closed on this amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. It is not.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Then I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. That amendment is now pending. The gentleman is recognized for the remainder of the time, three minutes.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, the rural-delivery system was borrowed by Congress from the Old World. Neither the people nor Congress knowing whether this system would prove successful over our country roads impelled Congress to direct the Post-Office Department to experiment with the service from the very first act, March 3, 1893, appropriating $10,000 for "experimental" rural delivery, down to the act of April, 1892, which took effect the following July. Then Congress made the system permanent. Nothing was done toward even experimenting with this system from 1893 to October 1, 1896, when the first "experimental" route was inserted.

Now, gentlemen, we went along with this system, Congress growing in knowledge from year to year through the experiments of the Department, and as we grew in knowledge we increased the appropriation and extended the service through the country, until from $10,000 appropriated by the first act, March 3, 1893, with no routes until 1896, we have expanded this service and enlarged the appropriation, until a few days ago the House appropriated $35,000,000 for the rural system, having now 38,000 carriers and about 40,000 routes. Would any Member of Congress, on March 3, 1893, have appropriated that amount for the rural service? Did not the great leaders of this House protest against the increase of the appropriation reported in the postal bill in 1898 because my now lamented friend, Dr. J. William Stokes, offered an amendment increasing the appropriation to $300,000. Did not the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] then say:

Now, let us not proceed too fast in this business. Let us not break down this system by going along too rapidly. Let us move carefully and see whether we can not establish a system that shall be a staple system, and shall help effectually the extension of this service in your district and mine. * * * It seems to me that there is not the shadow of an excuse for any gentleman to ask for more than $150,000—the full amount asked for by the Department and the amount which this bill proposes to appropriate.

And now, gentlemen, I say that we should experiment, go at it in a businesslike way, with some kind of a sane system by which we can improve our rural-route roads. There are roads and roads. There are good and bad roads over which this system now extends. In my own district, as in others, routes have been discontinued because of the bad roads and the inability of the local people to make them good roads. Now, why not allow the Agricultural Department to go down amongst the people and teach and show them how to build not simply a road, but a road that will last, and that will build up and make more serviceable a rural system and add to the wealth and happiness of our people and our country?

Congress has built railroads to carry the mail, and for that purpose it has built canals and bridges to aid in carrying our mail. It has spent millions of dollars to facilitate the rapid and faithful transportation of the mail. It has subsidized railroads and steamboat lines and improved our harbors and rivers, and before we had railroads it built national roads costing $20,000 per mile for the purpose of transporting our Army and supplies and the mails, and yet, gentlemen, we are spending $35,000,000 annually for the rural-delivery system and are discontinuing routes because of bad roads. The moment a Member in this House suggests even showing or teaching the people how to build rural-route roads, Members in the very wealthy districts raise up their hands in holy horror and shout "unconstitutional," and criticise and doubt the sincerity of Members from rural sections, who want more routes and better rural-route roads, and want the Government to at least inaugurate an experimental system of some sort by which better rural-route roads can be had.

I have not worked out a plan, but it can be worked out and we should start. I have not the time to discuss this question further, but I submit for the consideration of the Members and the people several opinions on the subject of the power of Congress to build railroads, canals, and other highways for the purpose of carrying the mail of the Government of the United States and of the people. The power can not be any longer doubted.

Associate Justice Brewer, speaking for the whole court in 1906, in the case of Wilson v. Shaw (204 U. S. Rep.), removes all doubt on this subject in deciding that great lawsuit, where the power was squarely challenged. Justice Brewer said:

POWER OF CONGRESS.

Again, plaintiff contends that the Government has no power to engage anywhere in the work of constructing a railroad or canal. The decisions of this court are adverse to this contention. In California v. Pacific Railroad Company (127 U. S., 139) it was said:

"It can not at the present day be doubted that Congress, under the power to regulate commerce among the several States, as well as to provide for postal accommodations and military exigencies, had authority to pass these laws. The power to construct, or to authorize individuals or corporations to construct, national highways and bridges from State to State, is essential to the complete control and regulation of interstate commerce. Without authority in Congress to establish and maintain such highways and bridges, it would be without authority to regulate one of the most important adjuncts of commerce. This power in former times was exerted to a very limited extent, the Cumberland and National road being the most notable instance. Its exertion was but little called for, as commerce was then mostly conducted by water, and many of our statesmen entertained doubts as to the existence of power to establish ways of communication by land. But since, in consequence of the expansion of the country, the multiplication of its products, and the invention of railroads and locomotion by steam, land transportation has so vastly increased, a sounder consideration of the subject has prevailed and lead to the conclusion that Congress has plenary power over the whole subject. Of course the authority over the Territories of the United States, and its power to grant franchises exercisable therein, are, and ever have been, undoubted. But the wider power was very freely exercised, and much to the general satisfaction, in the creation of the vast system of railroads connecting the East with the Pacific, transversing States, as well as Territories, and employing the agency of State as well as Federal corporation." (See Pacific Railroad removal cases, 115 U. S., 1, 14, 18.)

In Luckston v. North River Bridge Company (153 U. S., 525, 529), Mr. Justice Gray, speaking for the court, said:

"Congress, therefore, may create appropriations as appropriate means of executing the powers of government, as, for instance, a bank for the purpose of carrying on the fiscal operations of the United States, or a railroad corporation for the purpose of promoting commerce among the States. (McCulloch v. Maryland, 4 Wheat., 316, 411, 422; Osborn v. Bank of the United States, 9 Wheat., 738, 861, 873; Pacific Railroad removal cases, 115 U. S., 1, 18; California v. Pacific Railroad, 127 U. S., 1, 39.) Congress has likewise the power, exercised early in the century by successive acts in the Cumberland or National road from the Potomac across the Alleghenies to the Ohio, to authorize the construction of a public highway connecting several States." (See Indiana v. United States, 148 U. S., 148.)

(See also Monongahela Navigation Company v. United States, 148 U. S., 312.)

These authorities recognize the power of Congress to construct interstate highways. A fortiori Congress would have like power within the Territories and outside of State lines, for there the legislative power of Congress is limited only by the provisions of the Constitution, and can not conflict with the reserved power of the States. Plaintiff, recognizing the force of these decisions, seeks to obviate it by saying that the expressions were obiter dicta, but plainly they were not. They announce distinctly the opinion of this court on the questions presented, and would have to be overruled if a different doctrine were now announced. Congress has acted in reliance upon these decisions in many ways, and any change would disturb a vast volume of rights supposed to be fixed; but we see no reason to doubt the conclusions expressed in those opinions, and adhere to them.

The court of appeals was right, and its decision is affirmed.

CONGRESSIONAL STATUTES.

In the case of the Illinois Central Railroad against Illinois (163 U. S., 149), decided in 1895, Mr. Justice Gray, after stating the case, delivered the opinion of the court and gives an interesting history and the reasons why Congress has from time to time aided in building railroads. He states it was for the purpose of carrying mail, and for military and for other Federal purposes. Mr. Justice Gray in part said:

The line of railroad communication, crossing the Ohio River at Cairo, and of which the Illinois Central Railroad forms part, has been established by Congress as a national highway for the accommodation of interstate commerce and of the mails of the United States, and as such has been recognized and promoted by the State of Illinois. This will clearly appear by a brief recapitulation of the acts of Congress and the statutes of Illinois upon the subject.

Congress, in the act of September 20, 1850, chapter 61, granted a right of way and sections of the public lands to the State of Illinois to aid in the construction of a railroad in that State from the southern termination of the Illinois and Michigan Canal "to a point at or near the junction of the Ohio and Mississippi rivers," with branches to Chicago and Dubuque, "to be and remain a public highway, for the use of the Government of the United States, free from toll or other charge upon the transportation of any property or troops of the United States," and on which the United States mail should "at all times be transported, under the direction of the Post-Office Department, at such price as the Congress may by law direct," and in order "to aid in the construction of said Central Railroad" made like grants to the States of Alabama and Mississippi, respectively, for the purpose of aiding in the construction of a railroad from the city of Mobile "to a point near the mouth of the Ohio River." (9 Stats., 466.)

THE PURPOSES OF THE GOVERNMENT.

The manifest purpose of Congress was to establish a railroad in the center of the continent, connecting the waters of the Great Lakes with those of the Gulf of Mexico, for the benefit of interstate commerce as well as of the military and postal departments of the Government of the United States.

The State of Illinois by a statute of February 10, 1851, chartered the Illinois Central Railroad Company and ceded to it the rights and lands granted to the State by the act of Congress for the purpose of constructing and maintaining within the State such a trunk line and branches, describing its southern terminus as "a point at the city of Cairo," and declaring "said road and branches to be free for the use of the United States, and to be employed by the Post-Office Department, as provided in said act of Congress;" and, as if that were not sufficient, by another statute, a week later, the State expressly accepted the act of Congress and agreed to be bound by the condition expressed therein.

By the statute of Illinois of February 2, 1855, all railroad corporations of the State were empowered to make contracts with each other, and with railroad corporations of other States, for leasing, or running, or connecting their railroads; and by the statute of Illinois of February 25, 1867, railroads terminating at a point at which there was a railroad bridge on a line of continuous railroad thoroughfare were required to be connected by rail, as to make "an uninterrupted communication over such railroads and bridge as public thoroughfares."

A REPUBLICAN LAW.

By the act of June 15, 1866, chapter 124, Congress, for the declared purpose of facilitating commerce among the several States and the postal and military communications of the United States, authorized every railroad company in the United States, whose road was operated by steam, to carry over its road, bridges, and ferries, as well as passengers and freight, Government mails, troops, and supplies, from one State to another; and to connect, in any State authorizing it to do so, with roads of other States, so as to form continuous lines of transportation. (14 Stats., 66.)

By the acts of Congress of December 17, 1872, chapter 4, and February 14, 1883, chapter 44, bridges were authorized to be built across the Ohio River by any person or corporation having lawful authority therefor and with the approval of the Secretary of War; and were declared to be lawful structures and post routes for the transportation of the mails and the troops and munitions of war of the United States. (17 Stats., 398; 22 Stats., 414.)

The "national road," which, I again repeat, cost $20,000 a mile. It was built primarily for military purposes, but it was used for postal purposes and also by the people of the States. The whole history that is useful is set in the very interesting opinion of the Court of Claims in the case of Indiana against The United States, which opinion was affirmed by the Federal Supreme Court and is found in 148 United States, page 148, and I submit the opinion of the Court of Claims for the valuable history it contains on the subject of the national road, what it cost, the conditions of the many statutes appropriating money therefor, and so forth, trusting that Congress and the people at large may read it.

STATE OF INDIANA v. THE UNITED STATES.

[No. 16677. Decided November 9, 1891.]

On the proofs.

This case grows out of the statutory compact between the United States and Ohio, Indiana, and other States when they entered the Union, whereby the one agreed to reserve 2 per cent of the net proceeds of the public lands sold in each and apply that fund to the making of a road leading to the State in consideration of the other suspending taxation on the land sold for five years, and out of the subsequent statutes and proceedings of the United States in performing their part of the compact by the construction of the National or Cumberland Road.

I. The Act 19th April, 1816 (3 Stat. L., p. 289), admitting Indiana to the Union, contained a compact that the United States should reserve 2 per cent of the net proceeds of the public lands within the State and apply that fund "to the making of a road or roads leading to said State." This bound the defendants to expend the fund for that purpose, but not to complete and maintain a road at their own cost.

II. The Act 3d March, 1857 (11 Stat. L., p. 200), required the Commissioner of the General Land Office to state an account between the United States and Mississippi and other States, and to "allow and pay to each State such amount as shall thus be found due, estimating all lands and permanent reservations at $1.25 per acre." This entitled each State, including Indiana, to the balance found due, but not to the whole of the 2 per cent fund irrespective of the expenditures made for a road "leading to said State."

III. The Act 2d March, 1855 (10 Stat. L., p. 630), requiring the Commissioner of the Land Office to state an account between the United States and Alabama, established no principle which when extended to the other States would compel the United States to expend or pay the 2 per cent fund a second time.

IV. The construction of the national road from Cumberland westward was in accordance with the obligation of the act 1816 to apply the 2 per cent fund to "the making of a road or roads leading to said State" of Indiana; and the appropriation acts directing the expenditure to be charged to the 2 per cent fund were a proper application of the fund to its intended purpose.

V. Where a statute directs a public officer to state an account and allow and pay the amount found due, his allowance is either the award of an arbitrator or the accounting of a ministerial officer. If the former, his jurisdiction is exclusive, and an action will lie only on his award; if the latter, the statute of limitations will run from the time the statutory claim accrues irrespective of the accounting.

The Reporter's statement of the case:

The following are the facts of the case as found by the court:

I. After the admission of the State of Indiana to the Union the Cumberland or National Road was completed from Cumberland to Wheeling; and under the provisions of the Acts of May 15, 1820, and March 3, 1825, there was laid out and located a continuance of the road from the right bank of the Ohio River, opposite Wheeling, through the States of Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, to the seat of government in the State of Missouri. It was graded, bridged, and made a public road and highway from the Ohio River, opposite Wheeling, Va., to its western terminus, and upon it was transported the Government mail, and it was opened to and used by the public. But this was not accomplished until after tollgates had been erected and tolls imposed by the States of Ohio and Virginia pursuant to the Acts 2d March, 1831, and 2d March, 1833.

II. In 1872 the Commissioner of the General Land Office stated the account annexed to and forming part of these findings, and the amount of $6,380.85 by him allowed to the State of Indiana has been paid to the claimant, though the claimant did not accept it as a final settlement of the demands. But it does not appear, either from the said account or from the evidence in the case, what part of the expenditures upon the National road was properly chargeable "to making a road to the said State," nor does it appear what proportion of such expenditures for making a road to the said State of Indiana was properly chargeable to the States of Ohio, Illinois, and Missouri.

III. The account referred to in the preceding finding was allowed and certified by the Comptroller of the Treasury, but the questions now involved in this suit were reserved by the Comptroller for future consideration, as appears by the certificates attached to said account, hereinafter set forth. In 1873 the Secretary of the Treasury made an order that the account be reëxamined, which is likewise annexed to these findings; and on the 17th October, 1889, the claimant, by the governor of the State, made a formal demand upon the Commissioner of the General Land Office to state an account between the United States and the State of Indiana in accordance with the Act 3d March, 1857. No further account than that above referred to has been stated by the Commissioner of the Land Office.

IV. The following are the account, certificates of the Comptroller and order of the Secretary of the Treasury referred to in the preceding findings:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
GENERAL LAND OFFICE,
December 4, 1872.

SIR: Pursuant to the requirement of 2d sec. of the act of Congress approved 3rd March, 1857, entitled "An act to settle certain accounts between the United States and the State of Mississippi and other States, I have examined an ac. between the United States and the State of Indiana for the five per cent accruing under act of 19th April, 1816, upon the net proceeds of the sales of the public lands to 31st December, 1871, and under act of 3rd March, 1857, upon the cash value of lands within her limits embraced by permanent Indian reservations, and find that there is due to said State as follows, viz:

Amount of balance due her 31st December, 1856, per report No. 13457, on ac. of 3 per cent fund, as per certificate of the Register of the Treasury dated 1st July, 1872	$47.12
Amount of 2 per cent on $20,678,430.71, the net proceeds of the sales of the public lands from the 1st December, 1816, to 31st December, 1856, inclusive, as shown by the several adjustments of the 3 per cent ac. specified in statement A, hereto annexed	413,568.61
[NOTE.—In consequence of the expenses incident to the sale of the public lands in Indiana from the 1st January, 1816, to the 31st December, 1856, inclusive, having been in excess of the gross receipts, nothing has accrued to the State during that period, as shown by statement C.]
Amount of 5 per centum on $126,674.52, the cash value of 101,399.62 acres, at $1.25 per acre, of lands, situated within the limits of Indiana embraced by permanent Indian reservations, as per statement B	6,333.73
		419,949.46

As will appear from the certificates of the Register of the Treasury and statement hereto annexed. By reference to the third article of the sixth section of the Act of 19 April, 1816 (3 Stat. L., p. 289, ch. 57) it will be seen that two-fifths of the 5 per cent accruing upon sales of the public lands in Indiana were to be reserved and applied, under the direction of Congress, to the making of a road or roads leading to said State; and by statement D, hereto annexed, it will be seen that the pro rata of the sums from time appropriated for the construction of the Cumberland Road, which by law were to be replaced in the Treasury out of the 5 per cent accruing in Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, and Missouri, would more than absorb the entire amount of the 2 per cent which has accrued upon the sales of lands in Indiana. Hence, in the absence of special legislation authorizing the 2 per cent to be paid over, there would appear to be at present nothing payable to Indiana except $47.12, the balance due her the 31st December, 1856, on the 3 per cent account, and $6,333.73, being the 5 per cent on $126,674.52, the cash value, at $1.25 per acre, of 101,339.62 acres of land within the limits of the State embraced by permanent Indian reservations, which, pursuant to the ruling of the Comptroller in the case of the account for Illinois, the former is entitled to under act of 3d March, 1857. In consequence of the expenses incident to the sales of the public lands from 1st January, 1857, to 31st December, 1871, inclusive, being in excess of the receipts, nothing accrued to Indiana during that period.

WILLIS DRUMMOND,
Commissioner.

Hon. R. W. TAYLER,
First Comptroller, U. S. Treasury.

FIRST COMPTROLLER'S OFFICE,
February 12th, 1873.

Under the re-reference of this report by the Secretary of the Treasury, and in accordance with his request indorsed on these papers, the preceding certificate of the Acting Comptroller is hereby set aside and vacated, and the account will be held for further consideration as if such certificate had not been made.

R. W. TAYLER,
Comptroller.

JOHN ALLISON, Esq.,
Register of the Treasury.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
COMPTROLLER'S OFFICE,
5th Feby., 1874.

On further consideration I now re-affirm the decision and certificate of the Acting Comptroller, dated 25 January, 1873, as to the sum of $6,380.85, which is to be paid as therein stated; but all questions as to the further claim made by the State are reserved for future consideration. The sum certified to be paid to the Hon. Thos. A. Hendricks, Governor of Indiana, at Indianapolis.

R. W. TAYLER,
Comptroller.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
February 10, 1873.

SIR: In pursuance of the authority given to the Secretary of the Treasury by the proviso to the act of March 30, 1868 (15 Statutes, page 54), I have to request that the account stated between the United States and the State of Indiana by report No. 23447 of the General Land Office, certified by the Acting Comptroller, January 25, 1873, be re-examined by the Comptroller, and such action taken thereon as he may now deem proper. This request is made because, as I am informed, the statement of the account in said report and the certificate of the same conflicts with a former decision of the Comptroller, to which he adheres. The questions presented, as I learn, are pending in Congress, and I deem it proper to await legislative action before a final disposition be made of the claims of the State.

GEO. S. BOUTWELL,
Secretary.

(J. A. S.)
R. W. TAYLER, Esq.,
First Comptroller.

Mr. William E. Earle (with whom were Messrs. L. T. Michener and William B. Hord) for the claimant:

After reviewing the history of the legislation in relation to the provisions as to the public lands in Ohio, and then in Indiana, in connection with the history of similar provisions in the States of Alabama and Mississippi, Mr. Earle called attention to the fact that whilst the building of the Cumberland Road or National Turnpike was incidentally connected with this case, it was an incident merely. The long delay in the construction of that enterprise and the fact that in various ways it became involved in party politics had so delayed the work, that the general introduction of steam and the building of railroads superseded the importance and desirability of completing it. The compact with Ohio was to build a road through the State of Ohio and to the Indiana line, connecting with the navigable waters flowing into the Atlantic Ocean. The compact with Indiana was practically to the same purpose, as it was to build a road to Indiana connecting with the same waters in the east. So that it was practically two compacts on the part of the United States with these separate States to do one and the same thing. The money expended in building the road in Indiana, whatever it might have been, was not in anywise a fulfillment of any part of the compact with Indiana, but that was done under subsequent compacts with the States of Illinois and Missouri. Instead of completing the road to Indiana in accordance with the compact, the United States had turned over to Maryland, Virginia, and Pennsylvania, within which by far the largest amount of money had been expended and which States had contributed nothing towards the expense of construction, the portions of the road in them respectively, with the privilege of collecting tolls thereon. Subsequently all work upon the road and all purpose of completing it were entirely abandoned, and thus of carrying out the obligation.

In consequence of this changed condition of affairs, the United States having reserved 2 per cent out of the 5 per cent to which Indiana by common consent, with all new States of that time, were entitled out of the public lands sold within their borders, there was a solemn obligation resting upon Congress, which it fully recognized, to do something towards making this good to the State of Indiana, especially as, in consideration of this 2 per cent reserved to be expended on the "National Road," the United States had in the compact secured an exemption from any taxation of all public lands sold in the State of Indiana for five years after their sale, and the lands of the United States had thus been brought into greater demand and were more marketable.

Under the compacts by which Alabama and Mississippi were admitted there were similar provisions for the construction of public roads leading to these States as to the new States of Ohio and Indiana, and that by the sixteenth and seventeenth sections of the act of 1841 Congress had remitted to these States the 2 per cent reserved from them, and authorized them to expend it upon railroads leading to said States without requiring them to account to the Secretary of the Treasury for the manner of expending it, which under the decision of the Supreme Court is equivalent to an absolute release of the fund. Fourteen years thereafter, to wit, in 1855, Congress passed an act requiring the Commissioner of the General Land Office to state an account with Alabama, and pay over to it such sums as should be due on account of this 2 per cent fund. And sixteen years after the passage of the act of 1841, to wit, in 1857, Congress passed an act requiring the Commissioner of the General Land Office to state an account with the State of Mississippi "upon the same principles," and to include all Indian reservations therein, rating them at $1.25 per acre. In the second section of this act there was an express condition that he should also state a similar account with all other States in similar condition upon the same principles.

There were no other States at the time of the passage of this act of 1857 to which this second section could apply except the States of Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, and Missouri, and necessarily they were the "other States" referred to in the language of the act requiring the Commissioner of the General Land Office to state "an account between the United States and each of the other States upon the same principles." This act therefore, as is expressly shown by the petition filed in the case, is the basis of this action. By a well-settled rule of construction the sixteenth and seventeenth sections of the act of 1841 and the act of 1855, as well as the first section of the act of 1857, are to be read and construed in pari materia with the second section of the act of 1857, and become incorporated into it as part of the law applicable to the State of Indiana.

The right of the petitioner became vested upon the passage of the act of 1857, and this right essentially involved a trust on the part of the United States; because when one party, whether an individual, a corporation, or government, is bound to do a particular thing for the interest of another the law raises a trust; or where the transactions between the parties are such that a legal duty is devolved upon one for the benefit of another the law implies a trust. The United States had sold these lands in Indiana and had the records of those sales, and its officers alone knew how much had been sold, how much had been realized therefrom, and how much the expenses of the sales had been (for it was 2 per cent upon the net proceeds), and it alone had the whole data and machinery in its own possession and control by which the account could be stated, and by the act of Congress this duty was devolved upon one of the United States' own officials.

Being a trust fund, it is unaffected by the statute of limitations until the trust is repudiated. It is not competent and is not within the power of any save the Congress of the United States, representing its political power, to repudiate a trust which it by legislation has created. (State of Louisiana v. United States, 123 U. S. R., 37; United States v. Taylor, 104 U. S. R., 222.)

No laches can be imputed to Indiana. She has continuously and persistently urged the execution of this trust. The action of said commissioner on December 4, 1872, rejecting this claim was vacated and set aside by the First Comptroller of the Treasury on February 12, 1873, under an order of reference to him by the Secretary of the Treasury dated February 10, 1873. The matter was under advisement in the Department until February 5, 1874, when the First Comptroller of the Treasury reaffirmed the decision and certificate of the Acting Comptroller dated January 25, 1873, as to one claim embraced therein which was ordered to be paid as therein stated. But the questions as to this particular claim for the 2 per cent fund "made by the State are reserved for future consideration," and the questions involved in the trust now being prosecuted were held under consideration by the agents and officers of the trustee from that date until, on specific application and demand made by the governor and State officers of Indiana, on October 3, 1889, it was refused by the Commissioner of the General Land Office. This refusal put the statute in motion, and until that date it was dormant.

Mr. W. J. Rannells (with whom was Mr. Assistant Attorney-General Cotton) for the defendants.

I. The petition of the claimant does not state a cause of action. The following facts and propositions are deducible from it:

First. That the 2 per cent fund was reserved to the control of Congress, was interstate in character, and could be applied anywhere toward the construction of a road or roads which Congress would direct that led to or toward Indiana.

Second. The control of this fund was absolute in Congress and remained with it forever until voluntarily relinquished by it, and this it has not done.

Third. That an analysis of the acts of 1816 and 1841 in connection with those of 1855 and 1857 will show (a) that Congress only intended to relinquish its control of the 2 per cent fund so far as the States of Alabama and Mississippi were concerned; (b) that said fund was to be handed over to the control of those States upon the performance of certain specified conditions; (c) that the original end sought to be accomplished by the use of said fund was rigidly held in view by Congress in specifying the purposes for which said fund was to be used.

Fourth. That even on the theory that the conduct of Congress was such in its management of the fund for the benefit of Indiana that that State has a right to assert a claim against the defendant as such trustee, yet to sustain an action for said fund there should be an allegation in the petition that Indiana had expended a sum equal to the sum prayed for on a road or highway leading to or toward said State of an interstate character, or at least had a clearly projected plan for such road which would require the expenditure of a sum equal to or greater than the amount claimed. This fund was stamped with an inflexible purpose. The defendant, without legislative permission, was powerless to divert it. Can this court by its judgment divert it? If a judgment as prayed for is given, the logical effect is to do so. The benefit to be derived from this fund was primarily to the United States and but to incidentally benefit the claimant.

Fifth. There is no sufficient allegation of a breach of the alleged contract set out in claimant's petition. The claimant, after having admitted that the Cumberland Road was projected through the State of Indiana, and that the work had been begun thereon, and consequently money expended thereon, it fails to allege that said fund was not duly expended by the defendant.

II. The compact between the defendant and claimant did not create the relation of trustee and cestui que trust, because the fund to be expended by Congress was one in which the claimant was not solely interested, but was only interested in common with the other States from which the road came upon which the expenditures were to be made. Maryland, Pennsylvania, and Virginia were equally interested. The 2 per cent fund was reserved for their benefit, and as much belonged to them as it did to the claimant.

2. If the relation of trustee and cestui que trust subsists between the defendant and claimants, it is one implied from the language of the acts enabling them to enter the Union, and if it is true the defendant has failed to expend the 2 per cent fund according to the terms of said compact, and that therefore the claimants, and each of them, became entitled upon such failure to the money accruing from said fund, the action of each of the claimants nevertheless is barred by the statute of limitations, the right of action in each case having accrued more than six years prior to the commencement of the same in this court. (Rev. Stat., 1069.)

(See reports from the Department of the Interior and from the Treasury Department.)

All trusts arising by operation of law, whether implied, resulting, or constructive, are subject to the statute. (Rev. Stat., sec. 1069; Perry on Trusts, sec. 865; Wilmerding v. Recss, 33 Conn., 77; Haynie v. Hall, 5 Hump., 290.)

3. If the trust created by the compact between claimant and defendant is an express trust, is it withdrawn from the operation of the statute of limitations?

All express trusts are not subject to that rule. First. It will be contended that this rule only obtains in those classed as technical and continuing trusts which alone are cognizable in equity, and that claimants' cases can not be classed as either a technical or continuing trust. The claimant brings his action at law.

(Wood on Limitations, 414, and note citing numerous authorities: Van Rhyn v. Vincent, 1 McCal. Ch., 310; Kane v. Bloodgood, 7 Johns. Ch. 89, 109).

4. But the doctrine that the statute of limitations will never bar an express trust in equity is subject to exceptions, and the authorities subjoined are relied upon and are conclusive as the facts present themselves in these cases.

The reports from the Interior and Treasury Departments evidence a condition of affairs absolutely incompatible with the idea that defendant was claiming to hold the 2 per cent fund as and for the claimant State. They show the defendant was for twenty years before the commencement of this action claiming every dollar of that fund as its own, to reimburse it for expenditures as it claimed were lawfully made on behalf of the claimant States.

Sollee v. Croft (7 Rich. S. C. Ch. Repts., 34) cited and made a part of the text in Tiffany and Bullard on trusts, 716; The United States v. Taylor (104 U. S. R.); a very important case: Kane v. Bloodgood (7 Johns. Ch. 90); Oliver v. Platt (3 How., 335); Railroad v. Robinson (35 O. S., 483); Bacon v. Rives (106 U. S. R., 99); Baker v. Whiting (3 Sum., 486); Angell on Limitations, sec. 174; Davis v. Coburn (123 Miss., 377); Spiedel v. Henrico (120 U. S. R., 377); Farnam v. Brooks (1 Pick., 242). The court say in this case: "The statute of limitations therefore operates with us ex vigore suo in equity as well as at law, and not by the discretion of the court." (49 Iowa, 251.)

5. If the construction of the act of March 3, 1857, is as claimed by the claimants, they, from the moment of the approval of that act, became entitled to demand and receive payment of the 2 per cent fund. The trust was practically brought to a close by this act. Congress ceased to have further control of it. It became a money demand on the Treasury of the United States, and if the Commissioner of the Land Office did not within a reasonable time make the statement of account required by that act, they could at least, after the organization of this court in 1863, have brought their action here to recover, without waiting longer on the Commissioner. Their failure to do so was their own fault, for which no excuse in the way of disability has been or can be urged.

But if action upon the part of the Commissioner of the Land Office was necessary before the claimant's rights would accrue to said fund, then this was had almost 20 years prior to the beginning of this suit. (Taylor's Case, 104 U. S. R., 216.)

III.—1. The scope of the obligation assumed by the defendant with regard to the 2 per cent fund was that Congress should apply it toward the construction of a public road to or into the State of Indiana, and that by the word "road," as used in the third clause of the sixth section of the Indiana enabling act, meant nothing more than a general public road or passageway through the country for the use of the people. That the National Road, known as the Cumberland Road, was not only duly surveyed, laid out, and located continuously from Cumberland, Md., to and through that State, but the same was graded and bridged throughout said State, and used as a public highway to, into, through, and beyond the western boundary for the transportation of mails and for the use of the public for all purposes. That $700,000 more than the amount realized from the net proceeds of the sales of public lands of Indiana were applied by Congress to the construction of said road after it had been constructed to its eastern boundary.

The reports from the Interior Department and vol. 1 Roads and Canals, pp. 671, 672, 838, 848 abundantly show these facts:

2. The construction of the acts of March 2, 1855, and March 3, 1857, as claimed by the plaintiff, would have the effect to repeal by implication the third clause of section 6 of the act admitting Indiana into the Union and all of the numerous statutes which provided for the reimbursement of appropriations made for the construction of the Cumberland Road from the 2 per cent fund. To warrant such a construction it must inevitably follow from the language of those acts and be incapable of any other. There are others far more satisfactory. The most natural one is, that a new basis of accounting was given by those acts to the States of Alabama and Mississippi, which by sections 16 and 17 of the act of September 4, 1841, has previously been given the whole of the 2 per cent fund derived from the sales of lands of these States respectively, and that was, that the Indian reservation should be accounted as land sales at the rate of $1.25 per acre.

"Upon the same principles," if it had any meaning, simply meant that all the other States should be placed upon the same footing by accounting for all Indian reservations within the boundary of each of them in the same way. But there is another very satisfactory construction to be given those acts. By the terms of the act of March 5, 1857, the Commissioner of the General Land Office was required to state an account for the purpose of ascertaining what sum of money was due Mississippi. In stating that account it would be expected that all moneys paid on account of the 2 per cent fund or any expenditures to be charged to that fund made by the United States should appear upon the debit side against that State, and that at the end of the account would appear the balance, if any, due said State for it will be remembered that sixteen years had elapsed since the act of 1841 giving to it the disposal of said fund. The second section of the act of 1857 simply gave to each of the other States a like accounting, the only object of which was to ascertain and pay over the sum found due the State. To find the sum due, it therefore became absolutely necessary to charge the State with all expenditures on behalf of said fund, and that the unrepealed scores of statutes which directed a reimbursement from the fund were never intended to be disturbed by this act.

A careful perusal of the act of 1841 ought to set at rest all doubt about this being the true exposition of the act of 1857. Its policy, which was to parcel out the net proceeds of the public lands among all the States with due regard to equality; the handing over to the States of Alabama and Mississippi the 2 per cent fund to be applied to purposes of a kindred character with that originally intended; and the careful direction that the disbursements made upon the Cumberland Road should remain chargeable upon the 2 per cent fund provided by the compacts with the several States make plain the obscure language of the second section of the act of 1857.

The Attorney-General of Illinois, Mr. George Hunt, and Mr. Robert A. Howard were heard in the similar case of the State of Illinois while the present case was under advisement; and a written argument was also filed by the Attorney-General of Ohio, Mr. David K. Watson.

NOTT, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action brought by the State of Indiana to recover certain proceeds of the public lands pledged and set apart for its benefit, as is alleged, by the organic act for its admission to the Union. The facts are chiefly facts of which the court can take judicial notice, excepting the amounts of certain receipts, payments, and expenditures, and those amounts are practically undisputed, being shown by the accounts of the Land Office and Treasury Department. The questions in the case, therefore, are substantially questions of law, and they will be better understood by segregating them within certain chronological periods.

1. The first period extends from the admission of Ohio in 1802 to the admission of Indiana in 1816.

The Act 30th April, 1802 (2 Stat. L., p. 173, § 7), to enable the people of Ohio to form a constitution and State government and for the admission of such State into the Union, contained the following provision:

"That the following propositions be, and the same are hereby offered to the convention of the eastern State of the said territory, when formed, for their free acceptance or rejection, which, if accepted by the convention, shall be obligatory upon the United States. * * * Third. That one-twentieth part of the net proceeds of the lands lying within the said State sold by Congress, from and after the thirtieth day of June next, after deducting all expenses incident to the same, shall be applied to the laying out and making public roads, leading from the navigable waters emptying into the Atlantic, to the Ohio, to the said State, and through the same, such roads to be laid out under the authority of Congress, with the consent of the several States through which the road shall pass: Provided always, That the three foregoing propositions herein offered, are on the conditions that the convention of the said State shall provide by an ordinance irrevocable, without the consent of the United States, that every and each tract of land sold by Congress, from and after the thirtieth day of June next, shall be and remain exempt from any tax laid by order or under authority of the State, whether for State, county, township or any other purpose whatever, for the term of five years from and after the day of sale (section 7)."

This proposition was accepted by the convention of Ohio, and the State entered the Union, having thus given and received the prescribed pledge. The next year this "one-twentieth part," or five per cent, of the net proceeds of lands which might be sold within the State was divided; three per cent of the proceeds was to be paid directly to the State, to be, however, applied to the laying out, opening, and making of roads within its borders (Act 2d March, 1803, 2 Stat. L., p. 225). From that time on the "one-twentieth part" of the proceeds remained thus divided, and these two divisions of it have been familiarly known as the "3 per cent fund" and the "2 per cent fund;" the former being disbursed by the State, the latter remaining in the custody and under the control of the General Government.

In 1806 Congress passed an act for the building of the National Road from Cumberland to the Ohio through the States of Maryland, Pennsylvania, and Virginia (Act 29th March, 1806, 2 Stat. L., 357). Thirty thousand dollars was appropriated, to be paid out of the 2 per cent fund, or, if that was not sufficient, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated. But to the latter alternative was attached the condition that money paid out of the public funds should be reimbursed out of the 2 per cent fund as it might accrue. At the time of this $30,000 appropriation there was in the Treasury to the credit of the 2 per cent fund $12,652.

In 1808 the construction of the road was begun, and between that time and the admission of the State of Indiana there was appropriated for that purpose, including the $30,000 previously appropriated, $710,000, as shown by the following table:

Act of March 24, 1806 (vol. II, Stat. L.)	$30,000
Act of February 14, 1810 (vol. II, Stat. L., p. 555)	60,000
Act of March 3, 1811 (vol. II, Stat. L., p. 661)	50,000
Act of May 6, 1812 (vol. II, Stat. L., p. 730)	30,000
Act of March 3, 1813 (vol. II, Stat. L., p. 829)	140,000
Act of February 14, 1815 (vol. III, Stat. L., p. 206)	100,000
Act of April 16, 1816 (vol. III, Stat. L., p. 282)	300,000

All of these appropriations were for the building of a road to the State of Ohio, and every act provided in substance that money paid out of the public funds should be reimbursed from the 2 per cent fund.

At the time the expenditures upon the National Road were largely in excess of the moneys credited to the 2 per cent fund, which in 1825 amounted to only $200,000. Such was the condition of affairs when Congress passed the act for the admission of Indiana to the Union.

2. The second period extends from the admission of Indiana, in 1816, to the abandonment of the National Road in 1835.

The act for the admission of Indiana to the Union, the Act 19th April, 1816 (3 Stat. L., p. 289), like the Ohio act, proffers to the State the one-twentieth part of the proceeds of the public lands, and upon the same condition, that lands sold by the United States should be exempt from State taxation for a period of five years. The proposition differs from that of the Ohio acts, 1802, 1803, in only one particular, that it does not refer to "navigable waters emptying into the Atlantic" as the eastern terminus of the road, but simply declares that two-fifths of the one-twentieth part, that is to say, the 2 per cent fund, "shall be reserved" and applied "to the making of a road or roads leading to said State under the direction of Congress." The language of the act is as follows:

"Third. That 5 per cent of the net proceeds of the lands lying within said Territory, which shall be sold by Congress from and after the 1st day of December next, after deducting all expenses incident to the same, shall be reserved for the making of public roads and canals, of which three-fifths shall be applied to those objects within the said State, under the direction of the legislature thereof and two-fifths to the making of a road or roads leading to said State, under the direction of Congress.

"Fourth. That one entire township which shall be designated by the President of the United States, in addition to the one heretofore reserved * * * for the use of a seminary of learning, * * * to be appropriated solely to the use of such seminary by the said legislature.

"Fifth. That four sections of land be * * * granted to the said State, for the purpose of fixing their seat of government thereon, which four sections shall * * * be located at any time, in such township and range, as the legislature aforesaid may select.

"That the five foregoing provisions, herein offered, are on conditions that the convention of said State shall provide by ordinance irrevocable, without the consent of the United States, that every and each tract of land sold by the United States, from and after the 1st day of December next, shall be and remain exempt from any tax, laid by order or under any authority of the State, whether for State, county, or township, or any other purpose whatever, for the term of five years, from and after the day of sale."

Subsequent to the admission of Indiana the States of Illinois, Missouri, Alabama, and Mississippi came into the Union, and each State entered into an agreement with regard to the public lands that might be sold within its territory which was identical in terms with the foregoing statute so far as it relates to the two per cent fund; and indeed the only variation in the disposition of the "one-twentieth part" of the proceeds of the public lands was that in the State of Illinois the three per cent fund was to be applied to the encouragement of learning within the State instead of to the making of roads. In 1818 Congress appropriated money for completing the National Road between Cumberland and Wheeling (Act 14th April, 1818, 3 Stat. L., p. 426), and in 1820 began a series of enactments and appropriations for the construction of the road from the Ohio to the Mississippi through the States of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois (Act 15th May, 1820, 3 Stat. L., 604). These acts are thus analyzed by the counsel for the State of Illinois, Mr. Howard, in another case:

"After the admission of Missouri the appropriations are limited and restricted in different and curious manners. Commencing with the act of March 3, 1825, and going on regularly, March 25, 1826, March 2, 1827, March 19, 1828, March 2, 1829 (two acts), and May 31, 1830, the provisions are that the moneys shall be replaced out of the two per cent funds of Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, and Missouri. Then follows a series of acts, viz, March 2, 1831, March 3, 1832, June 24, 1834, March 3, 1835, in which the moneys are to be replaced out of the reserved funds of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, not mentioning Missouri. Then on July 2, 1836, the moneys were to be replaced out of the reserved funds of the four States, including Missouri again. Then come the last acts, March 3, 1837, and May 25, 1838, which provide that the several sums appropriated should be replaced by the States, respectively, out of the fund reserved for each. We have thus five kinds of appropriations—first, generally out of moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated; second, charged to the State of Ohio fund; third, charged to the fund of the States of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois; fourth, charged to the fund of Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, and Missouri; fifth, charged to the fund of the State in which work was done. Some of these come within the terms of the original compacts; some do not."

In 1822 the road had been finished from Cumberland to Wheeling, 132 miles, at a cost of nearly $20,000 a mile, and was in process of construction through the State of Ohio. Congress were then face to face with the fact that a great highway, covered by endless wagon trains, which passed over it ceaselessly day and night, required superintendence, repairs, and constant expenditures. The public at large were unwilling to maintain at what was then deemed great expense a free road for the benefit of a few States. The remedy of the time was to impose tolls upon the traffic of a road. Accordingly a bill passed both Houses for the erection of tollgates and the imposition of tolls, but it was vetoed by President Monroe, because he doubted the constitutional power of Congress to impose tolls within the territory of a State.

The action of the President left the Government and people of the United States in the unpleasant position of owning a road (with the consent of the several States through which it ran) upon which they could constitutionally expend money to any amount, but from which they could not constitutionally derive anything. Notwithstanding this constitutional light upon the subject, the people at large were not willing to continue the policy of expenditure, and a policy of abandonment necessarily set in.

That policy gradually took form and effect in the provisions of numerous statutes, the general purpose of which was that the Government should complete the National Road from the Ohio to the capital of Missouri, but that as fast as completed it should be surrendered to the States through which it ran. The following are the statutes referred to:

Act of March 2, 1829 (Vol. IV, Stat. L., pp. 351, 352).

Act of September 4, 1841 (Vol. V, Stat. L., p. 457).
Act of August 11, 1848 (Vol. IX, Stat. L., p. 283).
Act of January 29, 1853 (Vol. X, Stat. L., p. 152).
Act of May 9, 1856 (Vol. XI, Stat. L., p. 7).

But so far as the present cause of action is involved, which relates to the supposed obligation of the Government to build a road "leading to said State" of Indiana, it is sufficient to say that before such a road was completed Congress, by the Act 2d March, 1831 (4 Stat. L., pp. 483, 486), authorized the State of Ohio to assume control of a portion of it and to erect tollgates thereon, and by the Act 2d March, 1833 (ib., p. 655), granted similar powers to the State of Virginia; that, on the completion of the road in the States of Maryland, Pennsylvania, and Virginia, Congress surrendered it to those States by the Act 24th June, 1834 (ib., p. 680); and that by the Act 3d March, 1835 (ib., p. 772), appropriations were provided for the completion of the road in the States of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, and for repairs on the road east of the Ohio, but the act forbade that the money so appropriated for repairs should be expended until the road east of the Ohio had been surrendered to and accepted by the States through which it passes.

Finally, it is to be said that the appropriations continued after the recessions to the different States until the road was completed across the State of Ohio and to the State of Indiana; that it was not equal in construction or quality to the road east of the Ohio, but nevertheless had been graded, bridged, and made a public highway; and that its cost exceeded all of the moneys which the Government has received from the 2 per cent funds of all the States which have thus contributed to its construction.

3. The third period extends from the abandonment of the National Road as a national work, in 1831, 1833, and 1835, to the final legislation of Congress in regard to the 2 per cent. fund.

There are but three acts of Congress in this period which can affect the rights of the present claimant. The first of these is the Act 4th September, 1841 (5 Stat. L., p. 453, §§ 1, 16, 17), "An act to appropriate the proceeds of the sales of the public lands, and to grant pre-emption rights." It provides for the distribution of the proceeds of the public lands among the States and Territories of the Union, with a special reservation in favor of some of them, among which is Indiana, but nevertheless with this proviso:

"That the sum so allowed to the said States, respectively, shall be in nowise affected or diminished on account of any sums which have been heretofore, or shall be hereafter, applied to the construction or continuance of the Cumberland Road, but that the disbursements for the said road shall remain, as heretofore, chargeable on the two per centum fund provided for by compacts with several of the said States."

After many other provisions of a general nature the statute proceeds to deal specially with the cases of Alabama and Mississippi by the following enactments:

"SEC. 16. And be it further enacted, That the two per cent. of the net proceeds of the land sold, or that may hereafter be sold, by the United States in the State of Mississippi, since the first day of December, eighteen hundred and seventeen, and by the act entitled 'An act to enable the people of the western part of the Mississippi Territory to form a constitution and State government, and for the admission of such State into the Union on an equal footing with the original States,' and all acts supplemental thereto reserved for the making of a road or roads leading to said State, be, and the same is hereby relinquished to the State of Mississippi, payable in two equal installments; the first to be paid on the first of May, eighteen hundred and forty-two, and the other on the first of May, eighteen hundred and forty-three, so far as the same may then have accrued, and quarterly, as the same may accrue, after said period: Provided, That the legislature of said State shall first pass an act, declaring their acceptance of said relinquishment in full of said fund, accrued and accruing, and also embracing a provision, to be unalterable without the consent of Congress, that the whole of said two per cent. fund shall be faithfully applied to the construction of a railroad, leading from Brandon, in the State of Mississippi, to the eastern boundary of said State, in the direction, as near as may be, of the towns of Selma, Cahaba, and Montgomery, in the State of Alabama.

"SEC. 17. And be it further enacted, That the two per cent. of the net proceeds of the lands sold by the United States, in the State of Alabama, since the first day of September, eighteen hundred and nineteen, and reserved by the act entitled 'An act to enable the people of the Alabama Territory to form a constitution and State government and for the admission of such State into the Union on an equal footing with the original States,' for the making of a road or roads leading to the said State, be, and the same is hereby, relinquished to the said State of Alabama, payable in two equal installments, the first to be paid on the first day of May, eighteen hundred and forty-two, and the other on the first day of May, eighteen hundred and forty-three, so far as the same may then have accrued, and quarterly, as the same may thereafter accrue: Provided, That the legislature of said State shall first pass an act, declaring their acceptance of said relinquishment, and also embracing a provision, to be unalterable without the consent of Congress, that the whole of said two per cent. fund shall be faithfully applied, under the direction of the legislature of Alabama, to the connection, by some means of internal improvement, of the navigable waters of the bay of Mobile with the Tennessee River, and to the construction of a continuous line of internal improvements from a point on the Chattahoochee River, opposite West Point, in Georgia, across the State of Alabama, in a direction to Jackson in the State of Mississippi."

The second statute in this period is the Act 2d March, 1855 (10 Stat. L., p. 630), which directs the Commissioner of the Land Office to state an account of the one-twentieth part or five per cent. fund with the State of Alabama, and requires him to include in it the lands appropriated for Indian reservations.

The third and last statute is the Act 2d March, 1857 (11 Stat. L., p. 200), which directs the Commissioner to state an account with the State of Mississippi "upon the same principles of allowances and settlement," and also (by a subsequent section) to state an account with "each of the other States upon the same principles" and "allow and pay to each State such amount as shall thus be found due, estimating all lands and permanent reservations at $1.25 per acre."

Under the statute last cited the Commissioner of the General Land Office stated an account in 1872 and allowed a balance of $6,380.85, which was paid to the claimant. But it is proper to add that the claimant did not accept that amount as a final settlement, and that the Comptroller of the Treasury, when admitting and certifying the balance allowed by the Commissioner, expressly "reserved for future consideration" the questions which are now presented by this suit. In 1889 the governor of Indiana made a formal demand upon the Commissioner to state an account in accordance with the Act 1857, but the Commissioner has rested upon the account previously stated. Many other statutes and proceedings and facts were cited or adverted to by counsel on one side or the other in the progress of the argument, but in the view of the case taken by the court, the foregoing, it is believed, are all which bear directly upon the questions to be decided.

The position maintained by the counsel for the claimant, as understood by the court, may be summarized in the following propositions:

(1) That the two per cent fund created by the Indiana Act, 1816, was irrevocably pledged to an expressed purpose, and the purpose could not be modified or abandoned without the consent of the State.

(2) That the release from State taxation of lands which the Government might thereafter sell constituted a good and valuable consideration.

(3) That the Indiana Act must be read in pari materia with the Ohio Act, and so read they bound the Government to construct a road from navigable waters on the Atlantic coast to the State line, and of the quality and excellence prescribed by law for the road then in process of construction.

(4) That such a road has never been constructed, Cumberland, the eastern terminus not being on navigable waters, and the road west of the Ohio not coming up to the standard prescribed by law for the section between Cumberland and Wheeling.

(5) That the abandonment of the road as a natural highway, its surrender to the several States through which it passes, and the permission given to some of the States to erect tollgates and exact tolls constituted a breach of the compact, rendering the Government liable to the State for all of the moneys reserved for the two per cent fund.

And, finally, that the Act of 1857 was intended to accomplish this restitution, or at least to operate retroactively so far as to place "the other States" on a footing with Alabama and Mississippi as effectually as if they had been included in the Act 1841, at the same time, in effect, creating a trust, which relieved the claim from the operation of the statute of limitations. These positions have been maintained with great ability, not only by the learned counsel in this case, but by the counsel in the kindred cases of Ohio and Illinois, and they have been fortified by a comprehensive review of many statutes and decisions, of many legislative resolutions and reports, and the opinions of eminent statesmen and well-known lawyers and jurists.

But the position of the claimant will perhaps be more accurately and tersely defined by an extract from the petition:

"The defendant agreed to pay your petitioner 3 per cent of the 5 per cent of the net proceeds of the sale of lands, and to expend the remaining 2 per cent. thereof in the making of a road or roads leading to the said State, under the direction of Congress."

And by an extract from the claimant's proposed findings of fact:

"The 5 per cent fund was the property of the individual States, and Congress but the trustee to direct the expenditure of two parts of it to an express object—'the making of a public road leading to the State' of Indiana."

And by an extract from the opinion of an eminent lawyer, Ex-Attorney-General Cushing:

"It is plain to see that Congress, by enacting the laws in question, did, in effect, as we have previously shown, solemnly recognize and proclaim its abandonment of all claim to these trust funds, and the surrender thereof to the respective States."

The first question which the court designs to consider is the responsibility of the Government under the Act 1816, and its consequent liability to the claimant at the time when the Act 1857 was passed. In this inquiry we shall assume that the claimant's position is correct; that the 2 per cent fund "was the property of the individual States, and Congress but the trustee to direct the expenditure."

Conceding substantially all of the minor positions taken by the claimant; conceding that the Act 1816 created an irrevocable compact, obligatory upon the Government, and supported by a good and valid consideration; conceding that the road contemplated was to run from navigable waters on the Atlantic coast, and that Cumberland was not a proper terminus within the intent of the compact; conceding that the Government abandoned the undertaking before completion, and surrendered the unfinished road to the different States in which it was situated, and authorized them to assume the management of it, and impose tolls upon interstate traffic over it; conceding all of these things, it does not follow that there was such a perversion of the trust as to make the Government liable for the moneys which it received or to entitle the State to recover them to its own use.

The Government did not agree, through the medium of these statutes, to build and complete a road from one point to another at its own cost and charge in consideration of the renunciation of taxation and of the moneys reserved from the sales of public lands. If there had been such an agreement there would have been no trust. The compact would have been a simple contract to do a specific thing for a specific consideration, and the amount which one contracting party might acquire from the sales of its own lands would not concern the other. If there be a trust in this case, it is simply to receive and disburse the money of the other party; i. e., the money of the cestui que trust; and if there be any responsibility attached to such a trust, it is merely to disburse the money in reasonable time, honestly, disinterestedly, and for the declared purposes of the trust.

If the Government by the Act 1816 agreed to do more than this—if it agreed for a valuable consideration to do a specific thing and did not, its failure to perform was a plain breach of contract, and the claimant in 1857 was only a contractor, seeking damages for the breach. What, then, was it that the Government agreed to do? It agreed that "five per cent of the net proceeds of the lands lying within the said territory" should be "reserved," and that much of the agreement has confessedly been performed. It agreed that three-fifths of this five per cent should be paid to the State, and that obligation has been discharged. It also agreed that two-fifths should be "applied to the making of a road," and if there be any trust it is in the application of that money to that purpose.

That purpose was a public highway which should connect certain of the inland States with the Atlantic seaboard. Manifestly such a road could not be begun and finished by one operation from end to end. Manifestly there had to be a beginning long before there could be a completion. In the absence of specific instructions in the terms of a trust, to say nothing of the provision that this should be done "under the direction of Congress," the trustee would be invested with all needful discretion. Whether the road should be begun at the eastern terminus and built westward, whether it should be begun at the western terminus and built eastward, or whether it should be built by intermediate sections where it was most needed, were questions inevitably involving discretion, and upon which the discretion of a trustee could be properly exercised.

All that a trustee would be bound to do in such a case would be to expend the trust fund without unreasonable delay, according to his best judgment, for the good of the cestui que trust. Cumberland may not have been a proper terminus for the National Road within the intent of the trust as defined in the Ohio Act (1802), but the section between Cumberland and Wheeling certainly was within the contemplation of the statute, and if it absorbed all of the trust fund properly applicable thereto, assuredly that discharged the trustee. Not until it appears that the Government has money in its Treasury which should have been "applied" to the object of the trust, or until it appears that its expenditures of the fund were a perversion of the trust, can it be held accountable as a trustee. A trustee can not be held responsible because a trust fails to accomplish all that was hoped or promised.

The court can perceive no perversion of the trust in the manner in which the National Road was laid out; and, on the contrary, the manner in which the work was prosecuted through the States of Maryland, Virginia, and Ohio, so far as the facts are known to the court, seems to have been a sound exercise of a reasonable discretion.

Neither can the court regard the methods adopted for maintaining the road after it was constructed by its surrender to the different States through which it passed as an illegal abandonment of the trust, negativing everything that had been done, and rendering the Government liable for everything that it had received.

The statutes which contemplated the construction of a national road did not provide for its maintenance after its completion. They may have created a trust fund founded upon a valuable consideration, but they certainly did not require the trustee to maintain a free road at its own, the trustee's, cost. The funds derived from the sale of public lands in Indiana and other designated States merely contributed toward the cost of building the road: yet, if it had been built wholly by those funds, the discretion would still have remained in Congress of determining whether it was so far national, was so much for the general welfare, that it should be kept free at the public expense, or whether it should be maintained, as most thoroughfares were at that day, by imposing tolls upon those who used it.

If the road had been built entirely out of these so-called trust funds, and Congress had then sold it to the highest bidder for more than it had cost, the trustee making money out of the trust, and had authorized that bidder in turn to charge exorbitant tolls and make more money out of it, a question would be presented which is not now involved. Here the trustee made nothing out of the trust; the road to be useful had to be maintained; there was no fund wherewith to maintain it; there was no obligation to maintain a free road; the cost of keeping a much-traveled road in order was well known to be a large percentage of its prime cost, and Congress assuredly, without a breach of faith, might make the proper State governments the custodians of the road and authorize them to maintain it by the customary expedient of imposing tolls.

Neither can the court regard the appropriations for the National Road as an inoperative application of the trust funds to their legitimate object. A trustee in such a case would not be bound to keep the trust moneys in a separate parcel and pay them out eo nomine as he received them; the advancing of money before it was received was no injury to the cestui que trust nor advantage to the trustee; and the directions in the appropriation acts that this appropriation and that appropriation be paid out of any money not otherwise appropriated, but be charged as a payment on account of the 2 per cent fund, was a mere matter of bookkeeping. As legislation, the appropriation acts expressed the legislative intent that the avails of the public lands—the 2 per cent fund—should be applied to that object and in that way. The object was avowedly the one for which the trust, if any, was created; the method was one which could not injure the cestui que trust nor benefit the trustee, and which effected the purpose of the trust in the most direct manner. Whether there are still funds in the Treasury derived from the sales of public lands in Indiana which have not been applied to the object of the trust is another question, which will now be considered.

The Government, as has been said, was not bound to build the National Road out of public funds, and can not be deemed to have misapplied the moneys which it received in trust by the methods of construction and maintenance which it adopted; but, at the same time, a trustee can not throw half a dozen trusts into hodge podge and set up a general defense against his liability in each. The object here was a common one—the building of a road; but not altogether a common one, for a State was only interested in the application of the 2 per cent fund toward a road east of its own boundary line, and was not responsible for what had been built or done before it entered the Union. The compact with the Government was prospective, not retroactive, that the 2 per cent fund should thereafter be "applied" "to the making of a road." Each State was entitled to have all of its 2 per cent fund invested in the road, irrespective of what others were doing or had done; and if the Government mingled the trust funds, each State is entitled now, under the Act 1857, to its due proportion of whatever balance may remain unexpended. The Government could not receive $100,000 from Ohio, $100,000 from Indiana, and $100,000 from Illinois without expending $300,000 on the road. From 1802 to 1816 Ohio had been the only party to the arrangement, and during that period the Government had expended much more upon the road than it had received from the sale of lands within the State; but the moneys received from Indiana lands can not now be applied upon that deficiency. The State of Indiana was entitled to have all of the 2 per cent fund derived from lands within its borders expended, not for the payment of old debts or the making good of an overdrawn account, but for the construction of a road. The account to be stated must begin when that State entered the Union.

From the time when Ohio and Indiana became joint contributors to the common object, the question for an accountant is whether the joint contributions exceeded the expenditures of the Government. As each new State came into the arrangement, its contributions would in like manner swell the responsibility of the Government and be taken into the account until the road reached the State line, i. e., until a road was made "leading to the said State." Then the account so far as Indiana was concerned would stop, and the road constructed westward of its eastern line would be chargeable only to the States toward which it led. Chronologically the account must open when a State entered the Union, geographically it must close when the road arrived at its boundary line. Such an account will involve an accounting with all the States; for while the Government has advanced much more than it has received, yet nevertheless it is possible that there is one or more States whose 2 per cent fund was larger than the expenditures properly chargeable to it.

No such account was presented by either party upon the argument, and it is too involved to be framed by the court from an inspection of the statements of the Land Office; but at the same time the court must infer, from the concessions of counsel and the returns of the Land Office and Treasury Department, that the expenditures exceeded the receipts in all cases, and that if a proper account were made up no surplus would appear in which the State of Indiana would be entitled to participate by virtue of the original trust as defined in the organic act.

The ultimate question before the court, accordingly, is whether the State of Indiana acquired a new right to these proceeds of the public lands by virtue of the final legislation of Congress; or, stated more specifically, whether the intent of the Act 1857 was, that an account should be stated de novo, in which all of the credits to the State from the 2 per cent fund should remain, and all of the debits for expenditures made by direction of the various appropriation acts be expunged?

There is no obligation in the case, moral, legal, or equitable, leading the court toward this as the true intent of the legislative action. The government had done all that it had agreed to do and more; and had the right to continue to apply the 2 per cent moneys upon its own advances until it should fully reimburse itself. But Congress also had the power to wind up this business of road-building, to close the account, to carry the deficit to profit and loss, and relinquish the diminished avails of the public lands to the States directly interested in them, or to make a gift of all that had been received since the States entered the Union without an obligation legal or equitable to do so. Whether the relinquishment should date from one day or another, from 1816 or from 1857, was equally within the power of Congress, and alone by Congress could be determined.

The first renunciation by the Government of its right to control and disburse the 2 per cent fund was by the Act September 4, 1841 (5 Stat. L., p. 453, §§ 16, 17). The counsel for the United States has contended that this was not a relinquishment of the fund to the States named in the act in their own right, but that they were merely substituted as custodians of the fund upon certain conditions, which were that they should agree to expend it in designated improvements of a public nature. This is conceded, but it is averred in reply, that nevertheless the Government relinquished its right to repayment of advances from that fund and that the relinquishment was irrevocable. The relinquishment, however, was only to the States of Alabama and Mississippi, and the statute did not extend directly or by implication to the other States. There may have been reasons why this favor should have been extended exclusively to those two States, such as their greater need, that they had received less benefit from the public expenditures than the other States, and the like, and such reasons can not be questioned here; they are legislative, not judicial.

In 1855 a dispute apparently had arisen between the State of Alabama and the General Land Office as to the proceeds of the public lands; and it appeared that the Government, instead of selling all of the public lands within that State, had appropriated portions of them to its own uses and purposes by ceding them as Indian reservations. Accordingly the Act 2d March, 1855 (10 Stat. L., p. 630) was passed, which required the Commissioner of the Land Office to state an account between the Government and the State of Alabama, and "to include in said account the several reservations under the various treaties with the Chickasaws, Choctaws, and Creek Indians within the limits of Alabama." No "principle" for stating such an account is prescribed by the act, unless it be the declaration that Indian reservations shall be regarded as sales and credited to the State in the account.

Such was the state of the case when the final statute was passed, the Act 3d March, 1857 (11 Stat. L., p. 200). Its primary purpose was to extend to the State of Mississippi the additional favor which had been extended to Alabama by the statute of the preceding Congress. So far it was clear and consistent, for Alabama and Mississippi stood upon precisely the same footing, under the Act 1841, and in the fact that large quantities of the public lands within their territorial limits had been ceded to the Chickasaw and Choctaw Indians. The first section of the act accordingly provided:

"That the Commissioner of the General Land Office be and he is hereby required to state an account between the United States and the State of Mississippi, for the purpose of ascertaining what sum or sums of money are due to said State, heretofore unsettled, on account of the public lands in said State, and upon the same principles of allowance and settlement as prescribed in the "Act to settle certain accounts between the United States and the State of Alabama," approved the 2d March, 1855; and that he be required to include in said account the several reservations under the various treaties with the Chickasaw and Choctaw Indians within the limits of Mississippi, and allow and pay to said State 5 per centum thereon, as in case of other sales, estimating the lands at the value of one dollar and twenty-five cents per acre."

But the words "and other States" were added to the title, and a second section was appended to the enactment. It is in these words:

"SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the said Commissioner shall also state an account between the United States and each of the other States upon the same principles, and shall allow and pay to each State such amount as shall thus be found due, estimating all lands and permanent reservations at one dollar and twenty-five cents per acre."

This second section, therefore, in the use of the words "upon the same principles," refers to the first, and the first in the same manner refers to the Act 1855; and the Act 1855 specifies no "principle" for the statement of an account other than that the reservations ceded to Indians should become an item of credit to the State; and neither statute indicates an intent to prescribe any other change in the account, or to create a new liability on the part of the United States by revoking all the charges for moneys advanced which had been expressly ordered, not by the Land Office or the accounting officers, but by nearly all the appropriation acts authorizing expenditures upon the National Road.

Having thus directed the Commissioner of the Land Office to state an account and instructed him as to the principle upon which he should proceed, the Act 1857 commands "and [he] shall allow and pay to each State such amount as shall thus be found due." Finally, it adds to the foregoing instruction and mandate another, "estimating all lands and permanent reservations [instead of reservations for the Chickasaw and Choctaw Indians] at one dollar and twenty-five cents per acre."

Up to this time the States referred to as "each of the other States" had had no legal right to an accounting; for the administration of the fund rested exclusively with the Government, and these States were not entitled to recover or receive the money which such an accounting might show to the credit of the fund still unexpended for the purposes of the trust.

The Act 1857, therefore, seems to the court to have accomplished three things: 1st, by directing the Commissioner of the Land Office to state an account it provided a remedy, such as it was, for the several States, which, moreover, was the only remedy within their reach, this court not then having power to adjudicate claims; 2d, it created a new liability on the part of the Government, by making the permanent reservation of the public lands equivalent to a sale, and the Government a purchaser at the usual price per acre; 3d, it created a new or statutory right of action, by making the cestui que trust a beneficiary at law, in authorizing the States to receive directly the money which theretofore had been held in trust for their benefit.

It is not thought by the court that this statute did more, or that it could have been intended to do more. The advantages which the States of Alabama and Mississippi acquired over "the other States" was not by virtue of the Act 1857, nor by virtue of the Act 1855, but by virtue of the Act 1841, which changed the relations of the parties and substituted those States as trustee, giving them a legal right to the custody of the fund under certain specified conditions, which have never been extended to the other States.

There is no "principle" indicated in the Act 1855 which could possibly operate upon such expenditures for the National Road as had become charges against the 2 per cent fund under the authority of the appropriation acts. The sole benefit which the beneficiary, the State of Alabama, acquired by virtue of that statute was a credit for the lands taken for Indian reservations. The same thing is true of the Act 1857 when applied to the State of Mississippi. That State derived no benefit from that statute beyond the credited item of Indian lands. It therefore seems impossible that the "principle" which gave nothing to Alabama and Mississippi but a new item of credit for Indian reservations, could confer, when extended to "the other States," another and distinct benefit upon them, and, by retroactive operation, practically work a repeal of all the legislation which had made the appropriations for the National Road a charge upon the 2 per cent fund.

If it was so intended by Congress, there should have been added to the second section the words, "And the Commissioner shall also allow and pay to each State two per cent of the net proceeds of the public lands since such State entered the Union, notwithstanding the various provisions of law which direct that such two per cent shall be applied to the construction of the National Road or to the reimbursement of the Government for moneys advanced for that project." The judiciary can not import such a provision into a statute by inference or interpretation. To state an account implies a statement of debits and credits. To command a public officer "to state an account" and pay "such amount as shall thus be found due," is a very different thing from making a gift to the other party ex gratia of all the moneys that happen to appear on one side of it.

As it is possible that a balance may be due to the claimant on a proper accounting, we proceed to the consideration of a question which has been elaborately argued, the question of the statute of limitations.

As has been said, the only remedy which the States possessed in 1857 was the authority conferred on the Commissioner of the General Land Office to state an account and pay over the balance which he might find to be due. In 1863 Congress provided another remedy, an action in this court. If the accounting of the Commissioner of the Land Office was not essential, or a prerequisite to a right of action, the claim accrued as soon as the Act 1857 was passed, and accruing then, necessarily became barred by the statute of limitations on the 3d March, 1866 (12 Stat. L., p. 765, § 10). If, on the contrary, the accounting of the Commissioner was a prerequisite to an action in this court, and no claim existed on which an action could be brought until his account was stated, and he had "allowed" and "found due" a certain "amount," then, from the nature of things, his proceeding was judicial, and his jurisdiction exclusive, and the "amount" which he might "allow" was an award, and the only action which could be maintained would be an action upon it for the "amount" "found due."

Either of these alternatives is fatal to the claimant's case, if that case rests on the Act 1857. The trust was then at an end; the State of Indiana was then authorized and empowered to act on its own behalf and in its own right; a new cause of action was then created and a new right of action given. We can perceive no reason why the action could not have been brought as well in 1864 as in 1889, unless it be the reason that the court did not have jurisdiction of the claim; and if the court did not then have jurisdiction of the claim, it was because an exclusive jurisdiction was vested in the Commissioner of the Land Office.

In the earlier part of this decision we have considered the case as if a trust existed, but it is by no means clear that the agreement or compact between the Government and the State of Indiana, as declared by the act of admission, amplified by the Act 1857, constituted a trust which would take the claim out of the operation of the statute of limitations within the intent of the leading case of Kane v. Bloodgood (7 Johns. Ch. R., 69) and the case most relied upon, Irene Taylor (104 U. S. R., 216).

The money termed a trust fund was not money of the State of Indiana confided to the Government for a purpose, nor was it money of a third person paid to the Government for the use and benefit of the State. On the contrary, the 2 per cent fund was always the money of the Government, derived from the sale of its own property, and the statute creating the fund was in terms but an agreement that the Government should expend a designated, though indeterminate, amount of its own money in the construction of a public work more or less beneficial to the other party.

The State of Indiana never had an exclusive interest in the fund or in the work which was the purpose and object of the trust. The road to be constructed—the road "leading to the said State"—would not lie within its territory; the State would not be entitled to rents, issues, or profits therefrom; the utmost legal interest which could be possessed in the thing itself was a right of free transit for its citizens and agents; a right which would be shared by all the world. If the purposes of the trust had been fully carried out, and a road had been completed from Baltimore to Indiana, according to the extremest view of the obligation resting on the Government, the State as a body corporate would not have had therein the shadow of a property right. The trust has been ascribed to the Act 1857, but an agreement to pay money does not make the amount specified the money of the other party, and a gift of money, though by statute, does not pass a property in it till the money be paid. In the case of Mrs. Taylor (supra) the realty which was sold was her property, and the surplus which was in the Treasury was her money, and the statutory declaration that the Government would hold it until demanded by the owner necessarily created a trust.

In speaking of the Act 1841, and the course pursued by Congress in relation to the States of Alabama and Mississippi, the court has spoken in this opinion upon the assumption that the condition of the 2 per cent fund in those States was substantially the same as that of "the other States" referred to in the Act 1857. The argument pressed upon the court was that the public land laws are to be read in pari materia; that it has never been the policy of Congress to grant exceptional favors to single States and deny them to others in like circumstances; that by the Act 1841 there was inaugurated a policy of restitution, and by the Act 1857 this policy was extended to all "the other States" which in like manner had been entitled to the percentage of the public land sales erroneously or improperly expended on an unfinished road; and that "upon the same principles" which governed the restitution of the fund to Alabama and Mississippi, it must be restored to the other States. But as a matter of fact the cases are not parallel, and "the same principles" which govern the payments to Alabama and Mississippi are fatal to a recovery in this suit. The difference between the two classes of States is that the fund of Alabama and Mississippi was never expended on their behalf, and no appropriations were ever made chargeable against it. The payment under the Act 1841 was payment for the first time. They were then entitled to have the fund expended; not to expend it themselves, but to have it expended; their right to that was unquestioned, for Congress had never assumed to expend it, or made an expenditure chargeable against it. The acts 1841, 1855, 1857 repealed no statute by implication, and did nothing more than carry out for the first time the obligations assumed by the General Government when the two States were admitted to the Union, and no principle embodied in those statutes by any possible construction would compel the Government to pay or expend for those States the 2 per cent fund a second time. By the fact that the Government had expended nothing on their behalf when the acts 1841, 1855, 1857 were passed the analogy between them and "the other States" is destroyed.

The judgment of the court is that the petition be dismissed.

The Clerk read as follows:

PAPER MAKING.

To enable the Secretary of Agriculture to inquire into additional sources of raw materials for making paper, and processes of manufacture, in cooperation with the several bureaus of the Department and the paper mills, $10,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, including the employment of labor in Washington or elsewhere.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri was recognized.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order against the paragraph just read.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment which I wish to offer.

The CHAIRMAN. Amendments are not in order until the point of order is disposed of.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Chairman, I reserved the point of order, for I want to find out the purpose of the paragraph. I may be in favor of the legislation when I hear it explained.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I would like to inquire if I have not the floor?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri has the floor, but the gentleman from Missouri has not the floor to offer an amendment, because no amendment is in order until the point of order is disposed of.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Then I will make my amendment a part of my speech. I want to offer an amendment, on page 44. Amend by adding after the word "elsewhere" the following: "Wood pulp and white print paper and all ingredients used in the making thereof are hereby placed on the free list."

Mr. SCOTT. To that, Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. The gentleman can not make the point of order until I get through.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. He is bound to make the point of order in the very beginning.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. But I have not offered any amendment; I am making a speech. [Laughter.] Mr. Chairman, I do not want that taken out of my time. That paragraph as it stands in the bill goes to this extent: That Congress has made up its mind to find out if there is any new thing out of which paper can be made successfully and profitably. That being the case this amendment would be germane in this way: A penny made is a penny saved. This tariff on wood pulp and white print paper forces a rapid and unnatural consumption of our own forest reserve by shutting out the timber from other countries.

The situation is this: The newspaper men and publishers in the United States are almost unanimous in favor of this proposition. The other day every Member of this House was flooded with letters and telegrams asking that wood pulp and white print paper be put on the free list. There are just thirteen men in this House who prevent the editors and publishers realizing their wishes by the immediate passage of this bill.

There are twelve Republicans on the Ways and Means Committee and the Speaker of this House; they are responsible, and we might as well understand it. [Applause on the Democratic side.] There are only seven Democrats on the committee, and all seven of us are in favor of my proposed amendment. The editor of the New York Staats-Zeitung, Herman Ritter, has been visiting this capital off and on for the last three or four weeks, trying to induce the President and Senate and the Ways and Means Committee and the Speaker of this House to report this bill favorably.

He evidently had some effect on the President because your own President recommended it; but when Mr. Ritter talks to the Speaker I do not know what he hears. When he talks to the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee of this House, that distinguished functionary, with a smile that is childlike and bland, tells him that he can not get any relief while he is chairman of the Ways and Means Committee. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

I want to say one word more about it. I am not any more in favor of putting wood pulp and white print paper on the free list than I am in putting other necessaries of life on the free list. [Applause on the Democratic side.] The chief reason why I urge this in preference to the rest is that the Republican editors in the United States, if they are worth the powder and lead that it would take to kill them, will lash the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee and the Speaker of this House into reporting the bill, and if they do not, they ought to hold their peace forever after in this matter.

Mr. BATES. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I will.

Mr. BATES. The numerous editors who have petitioned for what they call relief on the subject of the tariff on wood pulp have been led to believe that it is for their interest to do so.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Certainly they have, and for the interest of their customers and numerous readers.

Mr. BATES. Does the gentleman from Missouri believe that the abolition of the duty on wood pulp would reduce the price of news paper?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I do.

Mr. BATES. If it would, why has the price of news paper declined and come down to the lowest price in the history of the world some years after the imposition of the present duty?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. It did not. That is the way to answer that question. And I do not believe a word of these figures that are sent in here by the Census Bureau—not a single one. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. BATES. One other question. Does the gentleman from Missouri speak from practical knowledge or from experience?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Why, I speak from the evidence of the editors of the United States, who are supposed to be amongst the most intelligent citizens of the Republic.

Mr. BATES. Does the gentleman know that the price of news paper about seven years ago was down to $1.85?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. No; I do not know that.

Mr. BATES. Well, I know that it was.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. How does the gentleman know it?

Mr. BATES. Because I bought some.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Is the gentleman an editor?

Mr. BATES. I was at that time half owner of a daily newspaper and bought it by the carload.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] has demonstrated here over and over again that those figures sent in here are not true.

Mr. BATES. I am not counting on those, but upon actual experience and knowledge, and that was four or five or six years after the imposition of the duty.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. If that is true, the gentleman must admit that putting it on the free list will not do any harm.

Mr. BATES. No; I will not admit that. It may be wise to put it on the free list, but I doubt if it will lessen the price at all. I do not admit it.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. No; I suppose the gentleman would not.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BATES. I want to state that that was the lowest price ever quoted in history, and that was several years after the imposition of the duty.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Are all the editors liars or not?

Mr. BATES. There are some of them who are not. I believe none of them are.

Mr. SMITH of California. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I would like to inquire what the parliamentary status is.

The CHAIRMAN. A point of order has been reserved, and under that reservation debate is proceeding by unanimous consent.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. A point of order on the paragraph has been reserved?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. And under that, by unanimous consent, general debate is proceeding?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I move that debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto close in five minutes.

Mr. MANN. Is that motion in order? Why does not the gentleman insist that the point of order be disposed of?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Chairman, I reserved the point of order against this paragraph with a view of knowing what was contemplated under the authority that is carried.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I will withdraw my motion until I have given the gentleman the information he desires, if I can do so.

Mr. SMITH of California. Mr. Chairman, I think I have the floor, have I not?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I would like to hear from the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture as to its real purpose, so as to be able to determine whether I shall insist upon the point of order or whether I shall withdraw it. I think it ought to be disposed of now.

Mr. MANN. I will ask the gentleman from Maine if he is going to make the point of order.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Yes, if the gentleman from Indiana does not.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. How long can a point of order be reserved?

The CHAIRMAN. Oh, it can be reserved until it is disposed of.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I will make the point of order now, and ask that it be passed on by the Chair now, so that that ends it.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Is the gentleman from Maine talking about my supposed amendment or about the paragraph?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. The "gentleman from Maine" is raising a point of order to the only question before the House, and that is this paragraph of the bill. I understand that the gentleman from Missouri has not presented his amendment as yet.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. No; I have not.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Then, I can not make a point of order on that now. I rise to make the point of order on the pending paragraph.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry. The Chairman recognized the gentleman from California [Mr. SMITH] to discuss the matter then pending. Can the gentleman from California be taken off his feet for the purpose of insisting on the point of order?

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Chairman, in answer to that, the point of order was pending and was insisted upon, and that had the effect of stopping general debate and taking the gentleman from California off his feet.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Maine desire to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. No; the gentleman from Maine only says that this paragraph is an extension of the powers of the Department of Agriculture, and vests in that Department an authority that it does not now by law possess, and that therefore it is subject to a point of order as new legislation, and I insist on that point of order at this time.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I have but a very words to say in opposition to the point of order. I beg again, however futile such appeals have been heretofore, to call the attention of the Chair to the organic act creating the Department, which authorizes the Secretary of Agriculture to conduct any investigations that may be of interest or that may develop information which will be of interest to agriculture in the broadest and most comprehensive sense of that term.

Now, if one or more plants could be discovered which would be suitable for use in the manufacture of paper as a substitute for wood pulp, I respectfully submit that it would be of vast interest to agriculture in the United States.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Will the gentleman permit me? If it would be of vast benefit to see if any other material could serve as a substitute for wood pulp in order to make paper cheaper, why would it not be of equal benefit to provide that wood pulp itself might come into the United States cheaper from other countries?

Mr. SCOTT. The gentleman from Mississippi does not expect a serious answer to that question. I have said all I desire to say on the point of order, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. It seems to the Chair this proposition goes beyond the provision in the original law under which the Department was organized, and therefore the Chair sustains the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

The employees of the Department of Agriculture, outside of the city of Washington, may hereafter, in the discretion of the Secretary of Agriculture, be granted leave of absence not to exceed fifteen days in any one year, which leave may in exceptional and meritorious cases where such an employee is ill be extended, in the discretion of the Secretary of Agriculture, not to exceed fifteen days additional in any one year.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. SMITH of California. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Nebraska——

Mr. SMITH of California. Mr. Chairman, I made the first motion to strike out the last word.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. Chairman, I do not think the gentleman can take me off my feet by that amendment. Mr. Chairman, I rise for the purpose simply of reiterating proof which I produced here a short time ago, that the market price of print paper before the Dingley bill was passed in 1897 was only $1.75 a hundred, and in making that proof and incorporating it in the RECORD, Mr. Chairman, I take it from the mouths of witnesses who appeared ten years ago before the Committee on Ways and Means. And, Mr. Chairman, while I shall not read this testimony at any length, I quote here from the statement of ex-Senator Warner, of New York, who six months after the Dingley bill passed became an officer of the paper trust, and who at the time these hearings were being had before the Dingley committee, in 1897, denied that he and others proposed to form a paper trust. In his testimony at that time before the committee he used this language, Mr. Chairman:

To-day we are selling a much better article of paper, I dare not say how cheap with Mr. Norris in the room, but less than 2 cents per pound.

Now, Mr. Chairman, that is evidence of record in the proceedings of the Committee on Ways and Means. It is evidence in the nature of an admission from a great paper manufacturer who six months later became an officer of the paper trust. It bears out the further testimony introduced before that committee from the mouth of that same Mr. Norris, of the New York World, that the price of paper was $1.75 per hundred. This record testimony utterly refutes the statement that paper has been lower since the Dingley bill was passed than it was before the Dingley bill was passed. As to the present market price of paper, Mr. Chairman, it is not necessary for me to state the price. The figures as to present prices have been introduced here by the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] from the Census Bureau, and an admission is made that the present price of paper is $2.50 a hundred as against $1.75 a hundred before the Dingley bill was passed. Now, Mr. Chairman, this small paragraph which has been stricken from this bill by the point of order raised by a representative Member of this House would only be a trifle. It would be next to nothing. Even that appears to be too much for the Republican majority. In striking it from the bill you have not only notified the newspapers of the United States that you do not propose to reduce the tariff nor to compel the paper trust to reduce their prices, but that you also stand against making the slightest effort whatever to discover if any other methods or processes of paper manufacture can be found.

Mr. WILLIAMS. And brought in competition with the trust.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. You take the position that you are willing to allow the paper trust to continue to force the papers of the land to reduce their enterprise, to discharge their men, and cheapen their product. By your policy you are not only making war upon the newspapers, but you are making war upon the great army of men whom the newspapers employ. You are bearing down in a severe manner upon hundreds of thousands of wage-earners who, directly and indirectly, are supported by the papers, without any protective tariff to help them. Yes, gentlemen of the Republican majority, of the thousand millions you appropriate for all purposes, you are refusing to expend $10,000 in an attempt to discover whether anything can be done to save the destruction of our forests at the hands of the paper trust and wood-pulp monopoly and give to the people of the country cheaper print paper. That is your position. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. SMITH of California rose.

Mr. SCOTT. If the gentleman will yield one moment, I wish to move that debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto close in five minutes.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SMITH of California. I think I owe it to the House, and particularly to my colleagues from California, to say a word in explanation of this question that has arisen with reference to this forest extension, concerning which I spoke a few days ago. In the debate on March 30 the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. POLLARD], returning from the telephone and saying that he had just had a communication with Mr. Pinchot, said this:

Mr. Pinchot has stated that the entire California delegation, including the Senators, except Mr. SMITH, in a body requested and almost demanded that this forest reserve be created for the purpose of furnishing a water supply to the city of Los Angeles.

And so forth.

Thereupon four of the gentlemen from California arose in their place and denied that they had visited that Office. That was literally correct.

Mr. POLLARD. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMITH of California. I decline to yield. To-day the gentleman from California [Mr. MCLACHLAN], who was not present on that occasion, brings forward the statement that, as a matter of fact, a number of members of the California delegation have subscribed to a letter addressed to the President requesting that the forest reserve be extended. Now, I should not like to have my colleagues rest under that rather doubtful position, and I will, with your permission, give you the history of the transaction.

During the summer of 1907, in the month of July or August, each one of the members of the California delegation received a letter from Mr. Olmsted, of San Francisco, who is a subordinate in the Forest Service, asking their opinion as to the extension of the forest reserve over a portion of townships 17 to 21. Now, bear those figures in mind. There was nothing at all said in the letter about any other forest extension. Townships 17 to 21 do not lie in the Owens River Valley at all, but immediately south of it, where the country begins to rise, and are therefore beyond the irrigable area of the Owens River Valley.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Are they a part of the watershed?

Mr. SMITH of California. No water originates on that. They lie in the bottom of the depression at the foot of the hills and extending out into——

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. But if there was water originating in that vicinity that would be a part of the watershed?

Mr. SMITH of California. I do not quite understand what you mean by "the watershed."

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Contributing to the Owens River.

Mr. SMITH of California. Not at all. The Owens River rises in the northern part of Inyo County or in Mono County and flows south into Owens Lake, to which there is no outlet at all. It is a lake that is absolutely unfit for any domestic or agricultural use. Senator NEWLANDS and others have a plant on the banks of that lake evaporating water for the borax that they secure in commercial quantities, and I am told if a dog should leap into the lake he would lose his hair—it is so mineralized and contaminated, and therefore is of no value.

The point is, though, the letter addressed to the Representatives was with reference to a body of land not along the banks of the Owens River and not in the Owens River Valley at all. I saw the correspondence on that subject a day or two ago, and my remembrance is that three, at least, of the Members said in reply, "This is a matter in SMITH's district, and we express no opinion. Refer it to him and take his judgment."

And I filed my protest. A little later in the year another letter was sent around to all the members of the California delegation except myself, in which it was stated in a general way, without reference to any particular land, that it was desired "to extend the eastern and southern" boundary of the Sierra Forest Reserve; that it was approved by the Chief Forester and some others, and asking that they sign a letter which was inclosed, and in all cases the letter furnished us is in the identical language and does not refer to any particular land, and several members of the California delegation, largely as a matter of personal compliment to the gentleman who solicited it, signed that letter, and it is here. I have seen copies of it to-day. Many of the letters, some of them at least, do not bear a date, it was so entirely informal, and all are in exactly the same language. I should say, in explanation, that they now claim the right, under this second series of letters, to withdraw the heart of the valley, 25 or 30 miles north of the tract of land to which I refer, and about which I was never consulted at all.

Here is Owens Lake [indicating on map]. This is the lowest part of Owens River Valley, from which there is no outlet [indicating]. The tract of land to which attention was called in the letter of July and August was along the lake, extending a little to the south, in townships 17 to 21. The matter in controversy, to which I addressed myself two days ago, was that part of the valley [indicating] extending over seven townships.

Now, there is the situation. Under the pretense——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SMITH of California. I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that he may proceed for five minutes more. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SMITH of California. Under the pretense that the second series of letters which was sent out, as I have said, already written and ready to sign, covered this new proposition to extend the forest reserve across the valley, there is an attempt to make it appear that the California dtlegation is responsible for the extension of the forest reserve to that agricultural valley. I think, without entering further into an explanation, that makes it plain that they did not intend to convey any such impression at all. But I will say one word more, that if every member of the California delegation, and every Member of this House, without knowing what was being talked about, or otherwise, had said or had intended that the Department should include that fertile valley in a forest reserve, it would not constitute a sufficient justification to make an order that such fine land as that should be included, or that one should be created when made under such circumstances.

Mr. McLACHLAN of California. I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. SCOTT. I shall object to that. I wish the gentleman from California will use the remainder of the five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the motion.

Mr. McLACHLAN of California. I hope the House will not get the impression——

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is closed upon this paragraph. The Clerk will read.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer a new paragraph.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert as a new paragraph the following:

"To enable the Secretary of Agriculture to test by cultivation such plants as may require test to ascertain if they be suitable for making paper, $10,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, including the employment of labor, in Washington and elsewhere."

Mr. PERKINS. I make the point of order against that.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, the organic act provides "that the Secretary of Agriculture," among other things, "shall test by cultivation the value of such of them," referring to seeds and plants, "as may require such tests, or propagate such as may be worth propagation," etc. This is an authorization to him to test certain classes of plants, making an appropriation to test a certain class of plants, where he is now authorized to test all classes of plants worthy of test, and in the form that it is in practically follows the form of the organic act. It does not confer any additional authority upon him. It only appropriates the money with which to make tests of particular plants. It seems to me that it is in order.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York desire to be heard on the point of order? The Chair is prepared to rule.

Mr. PERKINS. I would like to ask that the amendment be again reported.

The amendment was again reported.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. So far as I can see without stopping to consider it, and on account of the lack of order not having clearly heard the gentleman, it is exactly the same proposition in a little different guise.

Mr. MANN. Oh, it is a very different proposition. The original proposition authorized the Secretary of Agriculture to make tests in regard to paper making. Under the original proposition he might have made tests of gold bricks, sand, or anything else. The matter was not limited at all to the testing of plants. Now, the Secretary of Agriculture is authorized to test all kinds of plants that he may deem worthy of test, and this is simply an appropriation giving him the means, under the original authority, to make tests of a particular kind of plants which he has now authority to test, but has not the money to make the tests.

Mr. PERKINS. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. PERKINS. Do I correctly understand his amendment that it does not authorize the Secretary of Agriculture to make any investigation in relation to the process of manufacture?

Mr. MANN. Not anything.

Mr. PERKINS. Or to go into the paper mills?

Mr. MANN. Nothing of that is in the amendment.

Mr. PERKINS. It is solely to ascertain whether, from certain plants, material may be obtained for making paper?

Mr. MANN. Solely to test plants to ascertain if they are suitable for paper making.

Mr. PERKINS. I would like to ask the gentleman whether there is any reasonable probability suggesting that such tests would be productive of results, or is it a mere jump in the dark; or is there occasion to believe that this $10,000 would have some useful result?

Mr. MANN. Upon that point I may say I was informed some time ago by some officials of the Department of Agriculture that they believe that with a very small expenditure of money it will be possible to ascertain that certain fibrous plants could be cultivated in sufficient quantity, and with a small expense it would be perfectly feasible to use them for paper making, as against wood pulp.

Mr. PERKINS. I would state, Mr. Chairman, that although I did not make the point of order, yet I was opposed to this paragraph as it was reported, because it seemed to me it laid open the way for the Department to investigate the processes of making paper, and to go into the mills of this country to investigate those processes, and might sooner or later lead to the Department itself engaging in the business of making paper, instead of buying paper as it now does, which I should very much disapprove of; but with the understanding that it is purely an investigation as to whether there may be fit material to be used in the process of making paper by those who manufacture it, I think I will myself leave it to the gentleman from Maine to say whether he insists on the point of order to the amendment in the shape it now is. The feature that was objectionable to me has been removed.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair did not understand the statement of the gentleman from New York.

Mr. PERKINS. I withdraw the point of order myself, and leave it to the gentleman from Maine [Mr. LITTLEFIELD].

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I renew the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is prepared to rule. The Chair overrules the point of order. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to return to page 41 for the purpose of offering some amendments.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas asks unanimous consent to return to page 41 for the purpose of offering an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 15, page 41, after the word "Hawaiian," insert the word "and."

In line 18, page 41, after the word "provided," insert the word "that."

In line 19, page 41, after the word "Guam," strike out the word "and."

In line 24, page 41, after the word "Hawaii," insert the word "and."

Mr. SCOTT. These amendments are merely to make the necessary verbal corrections.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I shall not make any objection to that.

Mr. McLACHLAN of California. I desire to reserve the right to object.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. McLACHLAN of California. Mr. Chairman, I hope the impression will not go abroad that there is any serious difficulty between the members of the California delegation, for there certainly is not. I desire the House distinctly to understand that, personally, I do not blame my colleague [Mr. SMITH] in so far as he attempts to properly defend the interests of the valley which happens to be in his district. It is a small valley, but nevertheless the people there desire that the water in that valley shall be retained in that section, and therefore I can see his embarrassment. But I contend that he is going too far when he contends that it is a heinous crime that the city of Los Angeles is attempting to perpetrate upon his people by taking this water 220 miles to the south.

Mr. Chairman, I contend that the people of that marvelously progressive city that have voluntarily voted $23,000,000 to bring the water from that valley have proven their good faith and should receive due consideration from the Forestry Department.

When my colleagues in the House stated the other day that they did not go in a body to Mr. Pinchot to ask that this reservation be made, they stated exactly the truth, and I do not care to cast any reflections upon them, but by making that truthful statement those gentlemen created a wrong impression in this House and cast a reflection upon the Forester. They did in fact file letters with the Forestry Department and the President of the United States asking that this watershed be included in the reservation——

Mr. KAHN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McLACHLAN of California. With the exception, of course, of the three gentlemen, Messrs. KAHN, NEEDHAM, and SMITH, whom I excluded in my original remarks.

Mr. KAHN. That is all right.

Mr. POLLARD. May I interrupt the gentleman?

Mr. McLACHLAN of California. Not now. Mr. Chairman, this request was made for the addition of this land along this watershed by the people in the valley in which I live, a people who have gone to enormous expense to provide an indispensable necessity, which nature failed to provide. That request was made in January, 1907.

This land was temporarily withdrawn in February, 1907, and included the land along this river up through Owens Valley for 30 or 40 miles, as my colleague [Mr. SMITH] well said. In October of that same year the gentleman from California, including the majority of the delegation, made a formal request, over their own signatures, to the President of the United States, asking that this land be included in the reservation along that river for the purpose of conserving the water and preventing the contamination of the water that was to supply this great city and the surrounding country

Mr. KAHN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. McLACHLAN of California. I will yield to my colleague.

Mr. KAHN. Is it not a fact that all of these letters that were written were written in response to a letter that was sent out by the Bureau asking the Members of the California delegation for their views?

Mr. McLACHLAN of California. No, sir; they were written in response to a letter sent out by Senator FLINT, who initiated this movement, at the instance of the Forestry Department, away back in January, 1907, and subsequently the forester in that section did send letters out referring to other reserves which he was urging to be set aside for the same purpose, but these reserves were not made until November, 1907. The letters in response to Senator FLINT, asking the President to withdraw the watersheds through this valley, were filed in October, 1907. Therefore the Chief Forester, Mr. Pinchot, was acting in harmony with and upon the specific request of the California delegation, and there is not a representative of California on this floor to-day, either in the House or in the Senate, that will not contend that this action is for the best interest of the people, excepting always my colleague [Mr. SMITH], and, as I said before, I can see some apology for him in contending for what he considers to be the rights of the few people in that small valley, but I can not allow his zeal for them to becloud the real issue. Mr. Chairman, I desire to print as part of my remarks the letters which I hold in my hand bearing upon this subject:

W. F. ENGLEBRIGHT,
Member of Congress, First California District.

NEVADA CITY, CAL., October 21, 1907.

Mr. POLLARD. Mr. Chairman, I simply want to be put right in this matter, and I want Mr. Pinchot to be put right. I have been quoted by several gentlemen from California as having said that Mr. Pinchot told me that the delegation went to the Department in a body and requested the reserve to be created. He said nothing of the kind, and I made no statement of that kind. The language I used is, "The entire delegation, including the Senators, excepting Mr. SMITH, in a body requested the action." I did not make the statement that they went to the Department. I simply want to say that for the protection of Mr. Pinchot.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

EMERGENCY APPROPRIATIONS.

Prevention of spread of moths: To enable the Secretary of Agriculture to meet the emergency caused by the continued spread of the gypsy and brown tail moths, $250,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated and made immediately available. And the Secretary of Agriculture is hereby authorized to expend said appropriation by establishing a quarantine against such further spread in such manner as he shall deem best, in cooperation with the authorities of the different States concerned and with the State experiment stations.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order to that clause in the paragraph, line 12, "and made immediately available."

Mr. ROBERTS. Mr. Chairman, do I understand the gentleman to make it or to reserve it?

Mr. MADDEN. I will reserve it if the gentleman wishes.

Mr. ROBERTS. I would like to ask the gentleman if he intends to insist on the point of order after the explanation is made?

Mr. MADDEN. I can not promise.

Mr. ROBERTS. If he does it is no use to make it, because the point of order is good; but if argument will prevail, I would like to make it.

Mr. MADDEN. I would not like to promise.

Mr. ROBERTS. Mr. Chairman, unquestionably the point of order reserved by the gentleman from Illinois is good. But I want to call his attention to the appropriation bill of last year, in which almost the same language appears, "of which sum $40,000 shall be immediately available." The language is not new in the appropriation bill. Now, here is the point exactly in regard to making the money immediately available. If the money can be used as soon as the appropriation bill becomes a law, it will enable the authorities of the Department of Agriculture to proceed at once to the further work of restricting the spread of this dangerous insect, and I want to say to my friend from Illinois that a dollar spent now before the foliage appears is worth $3 expended in this work after the vegetation has come out. My colleague from Massachusetts says it is worth $10 expended after vegetation comes out.

Before the leaves are out, before vegetation has come up enough to hide the nests and egg clusters of these insects, it is comparatively easy to discover and destroy them. If they are not destroyed now, when they can be destroyed to the best advantage, the egg clusters hatch out, and we have millions upon millions of these insects which it will be impossible to destroy after the foliage is out, and which will, in their turn, lay new clusters of eggs and make the work all the more difficult in the succeeding year.

Now, in the interests of the economical expenditure of this money, I trust the gentleman from Illinois will not insist on his point of order. The language is put in merely for the purpose of enabling the Government to get the very best results from the appropriation carried in this bill.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, the point that I had in mind was that this was one way of providing for a deficiency that exists in this branch of the Department. The way ordinarily provided to obtain deficiencies is to come before the Committee on Appropriations and ask for a deficiency appropriation.

Mr. KELIHER. Mr. Chairman, I would like to say to the gentleman from Illinois that there is no doubt that his point will be declared in order, if insisted upon. A similar point of order was made by the gentleman from New York last year and obtained, but it handicapped the work tremendously, and I sincerely trust that the gentleman will not press his point of order. There is no doubt that there is merit in it, and ordinarily would command my support, but it will work a great hardship in this case and will cause us in Massachusetts to spend more money upon this meritorious work than we will be compelled to expend if we get at the work in proper time. For this reason I join in the plea of my colleague to the gentleman from Illinois that he do not press his point of order.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, there is no reason why there should be any such language in this paragraph, except that there is a deficiency in the Department. If there were no deficiency, the money appropriated last year would be available now for the work that is to be done at this time. If this language is necessary here, in order that they may be able to go on with the work, that is notice to the House that a deficiency exists and that more than the amount of money appropriated for this purpose last year has already been expended; but if the character of the work is of such a nature as to demand immediate action on the part of the Secretary of Agriculture, and if the interests of the State of the gentlemen are to suffer if this appropriation is not to be made immediately available, I should very much dislike to think that it was through any action taken by me that an injustice was done to the State of Massachusetts. I therefore withdraw the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I want to know whether these moths are interfering with the rural routes; and if so, I want to kill them.

The Clerk read as follows:

Eradicating cattle ticks: For Bureau of Animal Industry: To enable the Secretary of Agriculture to continue work in cooperation with State authorities in eradicating the ticks transmitting Southern cattle fever, $250,000, of which sum $25,000 shall be immediately available.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, simply for the purpose of getting an explanation as to the enormity of this disease known as "cattle tick," I desire to reserve the point of order.

Mr. BURLESON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to state to the gentleman from Illinois that below the fever line, the line fixed by the quarantine authorities in the South, there are about 15,000,000 cattle, worth approximately $200,000,000. It has been estimated that the value of those cattle has been depreciated fully 20 per cent by reason of the existence of the presence of the Boophilus annulatus, or cattle tick. The death rate of cattle below the fever line as compared with the death rate above the fever line is very much greater, in fact, expressed in percentage, is twice as great below the line as it is above, being about 4 per cent above the line and 8 per cent below. It is a matter of the greatest importance to the owners of cattle in the South that this item be continued in the bill. I hold in my hand a resolution adopted by the Cattle Growers' Association of Texas, from which I read:

Resolution adopted by the thirty-second annual convention of the Cattle Raisers' Association of Texas, March 18, 19, 20, 1908, San Antonio, Tex.

Whereas the Southern cattle owners are suffering annually great losses, resulting from the presence of the fever tick (Boophilus annulatus); and

Whereas the work already done has demonstrated beyond any doubt the feasibility of the eradication of the fever tick and the progress made with funds heretofore appropriated by Congress has been satisfactory; and

Whereas the known facts regarding the life history of the tick and the methods of its destruction justify the prosecution of the work of eradication on a more comprehensive and extensive scale: Therefore be it

Resolved by the Cattle Raisers' Association of Texas, in convention assembled at San Antonio, Tex., March 18, 19, and 20, 1908, That the appropriation made for this work by the Congress of the United States for this year should be increased to an amount commensurate with the magnitude and importance of the work to be done, which, in our opinion, should not be less than $300,000, and we respectfully request the honorable Secretary of Agriculture and the Representatives in Congress from our respective States to use their best efforts to secure such Congressional appropriation: Be it further

Resolved, That the secretary of this association be directed to forward a copy of this resolution to the honorable Secretary of Agriculture, Washington, D. C., and to each Senator and Congressman from our respective States; also to the chairmen of the Committees on Agriculture of the Senate and House of the United States: Be it further

Resolved, That we urge upon our State legislature a liberal appropriation by the State of Texas to aid in this work through the live-stock sanitary board.

You will note that this great association insists that the appropriation for this purpose be increased to $300,000. Now, as I understand it, the Committee on Agriculture has increased this item in the bill by approximately $100,000, but still it is not as large as the cattle growers who are injuriously affected by this pest think it should be. After a conference with the chairman of the committee, however, I will make no motion to increase the amount, as I understand from him that the bill carries every dollar that can be profitably expended during the next fiscal year, but I sincerely hope that the gentleman from Illinois will not make any point of order against this paragraph.

In connection with this subject, I desire to submit a very interesting address by Dr. J. H. Wilson, chairman of the live-stock sanitary commission of my State. Doctor Wilson has rendered great service in connection with this important work, and what he has said is entitled to great weight. His address was delivered before the Cattle Raisers' Association, and was as follows:

Texas produces more cattle and finishes less cattle than any other State in the Union. Texas sells more calves and young cattle than any other State. We are the real incubators. According to the report of Comptroller Stephens for 1906, there was rendered for taxation in this State 6,000,000 cattle, at a valuation of $54,990,000. This, too, you must remember was not under the full rendition law. With this number of cattle, more than we can graze and feed, it is necessary for us to have markets—markets for our young stuff as well as for our older cattle. They are expected to go to other States for grazing and feeding. The States that received them have the last say; and they fix the rules and regulation under which our cattle may enter those States. The majority of the States are anxious to have our cattle. They realize that we have well-bred cattle—steers that mature rapidly, and are good money-makers. The rules and regulations adopted by the various States prescribing the conditions and requirements under which our cattle may come into those States are reasonable, in that they require that our cattle shall be in good health.

Realizing the necessity of furnishing cattle in good health, the State of Texas in 1893 enacted a law creating the live-stock sanitary commission and defining its duties, etc. The commission is well named in that its duties are to look after the public health of the live-stock interests of the State. This was a real need—one that our live-stock interests could not afford to longer delay. With the entire State shut out from the markets, except for immediate slaughter, it would have practically destroyed the cattle industry of our State, and the prices for which cattle could have been sold would have been so low that no one could afford to engage in the cattle business.

THE QUARANTINE LINE.

Advising and cooperating with the honorable Secretary of Agriculture, it was agreed that a line across the State, beginning at Red River in Wilbarger County, and extending to the Rio Grande in Brewster County, should be adopted as a quarantine line; and that no cattle from south or east of this line should be permitted to cross to the north or west of said line, except under the conditions prescribed by the commission. Cattle from the north or west of this line, accompanied by a certificate or bill of health, are received in any State or Territory, and thus have the advantage of a market which our unfortunate brother below the line does not have. He can only gain access to portions of the Indian Territory, and it looks very much at the present time as if he will soon be shut out of that territory.

This brings us to the subject:

The benefits of the commission to the cattle interests: We propose to furnish to the purchaser of Texas cattle, cattle that are in good health. How are we to do this? By maintaining quarantine rules and by enforcing the rules and regulations of the commission, thus making our cattle what we propose for them to be—that is, free from any infectious or contagious disease. This work devolves upon the State; and it is very necessary that we honestly do what we represent.

Our cattle above the quarantine line are acceptable to other States. Below they are not. One very naturally asks: "Why is this?" It is because of that awful pestiferous pest, the "fever tick." This is the real objection to cattle below the line.

The amount of money it costs the Southern States to harbor the "fever tick" is not easily estimated. But from observation and experience we can form some estimate of this loss with some degree of assurance of approximating a correct estimate. Below the quarantine line we have something like 15,000,000 cattle, of a valuation of something like $180,000,000. The dairy cattle are valued at about $58,000,000, the other cattle at $122,000,000. It is estimated the shrinkage in value of cattle other than dairy cattle occasioned by the presence of the fever tick is something like 20 per cent. In round numbers, this would mean a loss of $24,000,000. This loss is truly appalling. We can not sit idly by and let such waste of wealth continue.

The average death rate among cattle for the years 1904 and 1905 in the tick-infected area was about 8.33 per cent; in the tick-free area, 3.12 per cent. In the tick-free area, where the winters are more severe, in the States of Illinois, Ohio, Iowa, Wisconsin, and Kansas, the death rate was about 2.4 per cent, while in the State of Louisiana it was nearly 9 per cent. This proves conclusively that in the tick-infested area, although having much milder winters, the death rate is much greater than in the tick-free area.

TICKS PREVENT BABY BEEF.

This is not all. There is another charge to be made against the tick. With tick infestation during babyhood, the only time the animal may with any degree of safety pass the ordeal, there is very little chance of bringing cattle to early opportunity. The stunting which they receive usually necessitates carrying them until they are 3 years old or older.

Under the present conditions, where can the south Texas cattle go for grazing? You are all familiar with the Osage matter and the unsettled conditions existing in that territory for the past few months. Heretofore you have used that section, but now they say, "Furnish us clean cattle." The State of Kansas has prohibited the introduction of south Texas cattle for grazing and feeding purposes. Oklahoma and other grazing and feeding States have practically the same rules and regulations.

He closed with an urgent appeal to the stockmen to cooperate for the general good of all.

In order for that portion of Texas lying above the quarantine line to continue to receive the benefit of the cattle markets, it is absolutely necessary for us to maintain quarantine rules and regulations, and to have a commission to see to their enforcement. And when that portion of the State below the line shall have eradicated the ticks, they will be entitled to and will receive the same privileges and benefits in all cattle markets as are now received and enjoyed by that portion of the State above the line.

In order to maintain and enforce quarantine rules and regulations, it is necessary to have the cooperation and assistance of the cow man, for without the support of local interests it is impossible to enforce any law. Ask any cattle dealer from Colorado, Kansas, Oklahoma, or the Northwest why south Texas cattle are not desired in those States. His answer is always the same: "Your ticks." If the tick is the only objection, and it is, why not do away with it? Drive the tick into the Gulf. When there is a will a way can be found. What is the way? Eradicate your ticks. The tick is the only obstacle in your way. With the tick a matter of history, your cattle would have the benefit of the markets of the world.

PEST CAN BE ELIMINATED.

The past year's work of this commission has demonstrated that we can eradicate this pest. We have been able to save the cattle interests contiguous to the quarantine line thousands of dollars. You understand that this line is the picket line. An ordinary wire fence does not always shut out the tick. Naturally, cattle will drift over. Then the trouble begins. By following the advice of the commission in dipping their cattle, the death rate in this area has been reduced to a minimum. We can do just as much for the cattle interests below the line. Already some portions of your territory are practically free from ticks. The owner of any ranch can clean his cattle of ticks.

Baby beef industry, with tick infesting our cattle, is an impossibility.

Instead of exporting, as we now do, to foreign countries over 1,000,000,000 pounds of cotton-seed products yearly—which if converted into beef at home would bring us from $6,000,000 to $10,000,000 more than we receive for it from abroad—we would feed our cattle, and thus keep at home this enormous amount. Besides securing this profit we would fertilize our lands. So, by failing ourselves to feed the cotton-seed product which we send to foreign cattle feeders, thus enabling them to compete with us, we sustain a direct loss of millions of dollars yearly. To eradicate the cattle tick from the Southern States means to a large extent the preservation of the supremacy of American agriculture; and, above all, it means increased prosperity and happiness to millions of our people.

The average value of Southern cattle per head is $7 less than that of Northern cattle. In Arkansas the value of beef cattle is estimated at $7.50 per head; in Iowa, $19.42—almost three times as much.

Another item of loss chargeable to the fever tick is the cost of special transportation, special yards, inspections, etc., which are rendered necessary by its presence and which loss must come out of the pockets of Southern cattle owners.

It is readily seen that the annual losses to the Southern States occasioned by the presence of the fever tick must be something like the enormous sum of $100,000,000. Since we have no cattle industry in the South, outside of Texas, to speak of, see what Texas pays to harbor the tick.

It has been stated by an expert that ticks will withdraw 200 pounds of blood from a cow in one year. Several broods of ticks mature in one season. It will be seen that the tick may deprive the animal while it is on pasture of several hundred pounds of substance.

TICKS PREVENT FATTENING.

We may expect an animal in good health to increase in weight something like 300 or 400 pounds on grass in one season. It can be readily perceived why even the best of cattle, on the richest pasture, when they are grossly infected with ticks, may grow poorer from day to day, or even starve to death.

In addition to the actual loss of blood, the constant irritation caused by the ticks, the sores which their bites induce, the screw worms invited thereby, and the resulting lack of rest prevents the animal from thriving and gaining flesh as it otherwise would.

Cows heavily infected with ticks often fail to bring calves or become irregular breeders. And this condition prevails especially as to heifers. In many instances abortion follows.

The Department of Agriculture has conducted many experiments and has expended thousands of dollars with the view of discovering a feasible method of eradicating ticks. After all these experiments and investigations, the arsenol dip has been demonstrated to be the most successful and the best method yet discovered, and your commission will continue to recommend its use until something better is offered. We have in this dip a preparation that will kill the ticks without injury to the cattle. If properly used, there is no injury whatever to the animal. We would advise that the pastures be divided; that is, into two or more pastures. The vat and pens should be properly constructed, the cost of which is nominal. We recommend the following prescription:

Arsenic, commercial	pounds	10
Sal soda	do	24
Pine tar	gallons	1
Water	do	40

In order to dissolve the arsenic it is necessary to have boiling water. Procure a galvanized iron pan capable of holding about 60 gallons. (Do not use an iron vessel.) Arrange for fire. To the 40 gallons of water add the sal soda. As the heat increases stir until the sal soda is dissolved. Add the arsenic; bring the mixture to a boiling temperature, stirring until all the arsenic is dissolved. Withdraw the fire, so as to have the solution below boiling temperature. Add tar by pouring in a small stream, stirring constantly. This will make a perfect mixture. To this add 460 gallons of water, making 500 gallons of the dip. This can be repeated sufficient to fill the vat. Dip your cattle from one pasture to the other, allowing sufficient time for all ticks to hatch and die before placing cattle again on the same pasture. It is very necessary for all cattle to be dipped. By "all" I mean every animal, for if a few are not dipped, they will continue to infect the pasture. These directions, if strictly followed, will clean your pastures of ticks in one year.

This commission is pledged to assist the cattlemen in this work. We offer at all times and in any and all possible ways to assist you to this end. We believe that it is a real benefit.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I am glad the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] is kind enough to reserve the point of order that we of the South may be heard in explanation of this very important provision of the bill appropriating $250,000 to enable the Department of Agriculture to continue its most admirable work in the eradication of the cattle tick, the immediate cause of the Texas fever, which for years has seriously interfered with the cattle industry of our section. I call to the gentleman's attention the fact that we made no protest against a half a million appropriation, several years ago, to stamp out the foot-and-mouth disease, which threatened the cattle industry of the New England States, nor have we raised our voices against the appropriations which have been made for many years to rid the sheep industry of the West of its greatest scourge—the "sheep scab." The gentleman will notice also that just a moment ago we joined with our New England friends in passing the item in the bill appropriating $250,000 for the prevention of the spread of the brown-tail and gypsy moth, which, unless controlled, promises the destruction of the New England forests. I mention these facts as an appeal to the fairness and broad-mindedness of gentlemen on that side of the aisle, and, parenthetically, I think it only right to say that I have always found them, in matters of a nonpartisan character, willing to meet us on halfway ground.

The Texas fever among Southern cattle caused by the bite of the cattle tick has existed in the South for many years, but it was not until 1905 that the Federal Government took cognizance of it by the enactment of legislation establishing a quarantine against the shipment of Southern cattle into Northern and Western markets. The quarantine line as established runs in a zigzag line from Virginia across the country to California. Cattle coming from the sections below this line must be conveyed in cars placarded as containing "Southern cattle," and must be placed in pens, when they reach the markets, reserved for such animals only and a large sign with the words "quarantined pens" must be placed on all such inclosures. Let it be borne in mind that this is a Federal, not a State, regulation, and we feel justified, therefore, in coming to the Federal Government for appropriations to enable us to stamp out this disease, to help us raise this quarantine, and to give Southern cattle an equal chance in the markets of the country. I am sure this must appeal to my friend from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] as entirely just and fair.

Mr. Chairman, the presence of the cattle tick has been most disastrous to the Southern cattle industry and the losses from it are so enormous as to be almost beyond computation. Below the quarantine line there are between fifteen and sixteen million cattle, with an approximate value of $200,000,000. Those familiar with the subject estimate an annual loss of the enormous sum of $100,000,000 to this industry on account of the presence of the cattle tick and the existence of the quarantine. This is the direct loss; presently I shall discuss the indirect loss. I want to read from the hearings before the Committee on Agriculture a part of the statement of Dr. R. A. Ramsay, of the Bureau of Animal Industry, made in January, 1907. Dr. Ramsay was speaking of the losses suffered by the cattle industry because of the cattle tick, and the chairman of the committee asked:

How do you make up these figures?

Doctor RAMSAY. Well, I could not tell you all the corners, but there is a bulletin gotten out by our Pathological Division that explains that. It is made up by the loss in milk and meat, and the loss from being unable to get Northern cattle down there to improve the breeds of cattle in the South, so that the cattle there have become deteriorated and run down. They can not get a bull there to cross on them to improve their herds in any way, and they are not making the money out of their cattle that they ought to make. The South should be a good cattle country.

Mr. LEVER. What is the difference in price of cattle above and below the quarantine line?

Doctor RAMSAY. Just about half.

Mr. LEVER. About half?

Doctor RAMSAY. I do not know that it would be quite that.

The CHAIRMAN. That is almost as much due to the quarantine line as to the quality of the cattle.

Doctor RAMSAY. That is due to the quality of the cattle, as I said.

The CHAIRMAN. The great cattle country in this country is north of the quarantine line, except in Texas.

Mr. LEVER. But the quality of the cattle is largely affected by the presence of the cattle tick?

Doctor RAMSAY. Yes.

Mr. Chairman, this is a most interesting statement and it shows under what a tremendous handicap the Southern cattle industry labors. No one familiar with Southern conditions doubts for a moment that the cattle industry, if given a fair showing, may be made most profitable. Our seasons are long and mild, our forage crops and grasses abundant and the local demand for dairy and beef products is large. The South is importing beef, butter, cheese, milk, and cream from Northern and Western markets, spending millions of dollars per year for these necessities of life which can be produced at home. The only bar is the cattle tick, which carries with it the odium of the quarantine against Southern cattle. We are practically shut out of the markets of the country as far as our beef cattle are concerned, while at the same time we are shut in as against the introduction of the better breeds of cattle and the improvement which must result to our herds from such an introduction. The dairy industry is making great strides under the direction of the Department of Agriculture. It will be remembered that several years ago I had the honor of securing an appropriation of $20,000 to enable the Secretary of Agriculture to employ expert dairymen to teach the Southern dairymen the best and most improved methods of that business. The result of that work is shown in the report of the Secretary of Agriculture for 1907, in which he says:

> The results from sixteen herds have been compiled for illustration and show an average increase of $3.75 in the monthly production of each cow.

This, Mr. Chairman, is an indication of what can be done in the dairy business of the South even under present conditions. The same thing can be done with respect to beef cattle. Why should the Southern States ship their cotton-seed meal, the best beef-cattle ration known, to the Northern States, where it is converted into the finest beef and at the same time goes to enrich the soil of those States? Why should we pay tribute to the Northern cattle industry in the sum of millions of dollars yearly when this might be saved by building up an industry of our own? The answer is, We have the cattle tick with us, and the Federal Government has surrounded us with a deadly quarantine line. As a matter of right, we demand that the Federal Government help us deal with this problem.

The industrial welfare of the South goes to swell the national wealth and power, and whatever affects our interest affects the interests of the whole country. Our problems are your problems; we are back in the Union; our fortunes are linked with yours; we contribute our support to the National Government, out of proportion to our strength, and we ask only fair treatment from you.

I will say to my friend from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] that, unfortunately, in the South we have the one-crop system. Cotton is all important; everybody raises it. The more thoughtful men are bending their every effort to bring about a diversification of our agriculture and our industries. We have the possibilities, and all we need to do is to take advantage of them.

We know what the live-stock industry has meant to the agriculture of every country; we know that it is the basis of real agricultural success; we know that it is the bed rock of diversified agriculture, and we want to remove every handicap to its upbuilding in the South. Give this important industry a fair deal, unshackle it, and its success is assured.

The friendly nods of the gentleman assure me that he will not insist upon the point of order, and further debate is unnecessary. [Applause.]

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the point of order.

Mr. BURLESON. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by adding after line 23, on page 45, the following:

"That it shall be unlawful for any person or association to send or cause to be sent from one State or Territory of the United States or the District of Columbia to any other State or Territory of the United States or the District of Columbia or to any foreign country, or knowingly to receive or knowingly to cause to be received in any State or Territory of the United States or the District of Columbia or from any foreign country, by a telegraph or telephone line, any message relating to a contract for future delivery of cotton without intending that the cotton so contracted for shall be actually delivered or received, or relating to a contract whereby a party thereto, or any party for whom or in whose behalf such contract is made, acquires the right or privilege to demand in the future the acceptance or the delivery of cotton without being thereby obligated to deliver or to accept said cotton. Any person, whether acting individually or as a member, officer, agent, or employee of any person or association, who shall be guilty of violating this section shall, upon conviction thereof, be fined in any sum not more than $1,000 nor less than $500 and shall be imprisoned for not more than six months nor less than one month, and the sending or the causing to be sent or the receiving or the causing to be received of each message shall constitute a separate offense.

"SEC. 2. That it shall be the duty of any person or association sending or receiving by means of a telegraph or telephone line any message relating to a contract or the making of a contract for the future delivery of cotton to furnish, upon demand, to the sender or recipient of such message an affidavit stating that he is the owner of the cotton so being contracted for, and that he has the intention to deliver said cotton, or that said cotton is at the time in actual course of growth on land owned or occupied by him and that he has the intention to deliver said cotton, or that he is at this time legally entitled to the right of future possession of said cotton under and by virtue of a contract for the sale and future delivery thereof previously made by the owner of said cotton, giving the name of the party or the names of the parties to the contract, the time when, the place where the contract was made, and the price therein stipulated, and that he has the intention to deliver said cotton, or that he has the bona fide intention of producing and delivering said cotton, or that he has the bona fide intention of acquiring and delivering said cotton, or that he has the bona fide intention of receiving and paying for said cotton. In an indictment brought under section 1 of this act the failure to make promptly such affidavit on request shall be prima facie evidence that the message sent related to a contract or the making of a contract for future delivery of cotton without the intention actually to deliver or receive the said cotton.

"SEC. 3. That it shall be unlawful for any person owning or operating any telegraph or telephone line, or acting as officer, agent, or employee of such person, knowingly to use his property or knowingly to allow his property to be used for the transmission from one State or Territory of the United States or the District of Columbia to any other State or Territory of the United States or the District of Columbia or to any foreign country, or knowingly to receive or knowingly to cause to be received in any State or Territory of the United States or the District of Columbia from any other State or Territory of the United States or the District of Columbia or from any foreign country, of any message relating to such contracts as are described in section 1 of this act. Any person, whether acting individually or as a member, officer, agent, or employee of a telegraph or telephone company, who shall be guilty of violating this section shall, upon conviction thereof, be punished for each offense by a fine of not more than $1,000 nor less than $500, and the sending of each message in violation of the provisions of this section shall constitute a separate offense.

"SEC. 4. That it shall be unlawful for any person owning or operating any telegraph or telephone line, or acting as officer, agent, or employee of such person, knowingly to use his property or knowingly to allow his property to be used for the transmission from one State or Territory of the United States or the District of Columbia to any other State or Territory of the United States or the District of Columbia or to any foreign country, or knowingly to receive or cause to be received in any State or Territory of the United States or the District of Columbia from any other State or Territory of the United States or the District of Columbia or from any foreign country, of any message presented by a person engaged in a commission or brokerage business, or presented by a produce exchange corporation or association, relating to a contract for the purchase or sale of cotton unless the person engaged in a commission or brokerage business or the produce exchange corporation or association shall have filed, either personally or through the manager of such person or association, with the telegraph or telephone company an affidavit stating that the message or messages being sent and to be sent for the six months next ensuing by such person or association do not and will not relate to any such contracts as are described in section 1 of this act. A similar affidavit shall be filed before the end of the six months covered by the first affidavit. Any person owning or operating a telegraph or telephone line, or officer, agent, or employee of such person, who knowingly is a party to a violation of this section shall be punished for each offense by a fine of not more than $1,000 nor less than $500. Any person or association required to file the affidavit herein provided for who shall make a false statement in said affidavit shall be punished by a fine of not more than $5,000 nor less than $1,000 and shall be imprisoned for not more than two years nor less than one year.

"SEC. 5. That every book, newspaper, pamphlet, letter, writing, or other publication containing a notice, account, or record of the transactions of any produce exchange wherein such contracts as are described in section 1 of this act are made is hereby declared to be nonmailable matter and shall not be conveyed in the mails of the United States or delivered from any post-office by any letter carrier. Whoever shall knowingly deposit or knowingly cause to be deposited for mailing or delivery any matter declared by this section to be nonmailable, or shall knowingly take or cause the same to be taken from the mails for the purpose of circulating or disposing thereof or of aiding in the circulating or disposition thereof, shall be fined not more than $5,000 nor less than $1,000 or shall be imprisoned not more than five years nor less than one year, or both.

"SEC. 6. That the Postmaster-General may, upon evidence satisfactory to himself that any person or association is sending through the mails of the United States any mail containing a notice, account, or record of the transactions of any produce exchange wherein such contracts as are described in section 1 of this act are made, instruct the postmasters in the post-offices at which such mail arrives to return all such mail to the postmaster in the post-office at which it was originally mailed, with the word 'unlawful' plainly written or stamped upon the outside thereof, and all such mail when returned to said postmaster shall be returned to the sender or publisher thereof, under such regulations as the Postmaster-General may prescribe."

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order.

Mr. BURLESON. Mr. Chairman, this amendment is quite lengthy, but its purpose can be summed up in very few words. It is a bill introduced by me and is intended to abolish gambling in cotton on the exchanges by prohibiting the use of the mails, the telephone, and telegraph lines to those who deal in contracts for future delivery of cotton, with no intention on the part of the buyer to receive or the seller to deliver the actual cotton. A number of bills to accomplish the same purpose have been introduced by others. Recently members of this body have been showered through the mails with pamphlets, circulars, leaflets, and letters, setting forth in most plausible form the arguments of the defenders and apologists for the practices of the cotton exchanges, and in nearly every instance or particular, assault is directed against the bill introduced by me. It is evident to my mind that the reason this policy is pursued is the fear on the part of those well advised that my bill would, if enacted into law, completely destroy or prevent the continuation of those hurtful practices of the exchanges, against which the producers of cotton and the consumers of cotton have been crying out for so many years.

Mr. Chairman, I do not care to discuss at this time the details of the bill introduced by me, but I would like to discuss in a broad way the necessity for some legislation of the character proposed in this amendment and to answer as far as possible in the limited time at my command the principal reasons and arguments set forth in these pamphlets and circulars against the Congress taking action on my bill or any other bill having for its purpose the accomplishment of the same end.

I anticipated that my alert friend from the metropolis of the West [Mr. MADDEN] would make the point of order upon this amendment, and if by chance it escaped him I was sure my ever-watchful friend from Greater New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] would block its course. In fact, I had no expectation of engrafting my bill as an amendment upon this appropriation bill, and I only offer it in order to secure an opportunity to discuss it. I recognize the fact that this is a matter of great importance and do not hesitate to say that every interest affected by the proposed legislation should be given a full hearing before any action is attempted by the Congress. And, speaking for the producers of cotton, Mr. Chairman, I want to state that they have no desire, they have no purpose, of making an effort to have legislation of any character enacted here that would in the remotest degree affect injuriously any legitimate interest connected with the cotton trade. Now, as it will be impossible for me to discuss this proposed legislation in the limited time fixed by the rules, I ask that I may be permitted to continue my remarks upon this nonpartisan subject for thirty minutes, at the expiration of which time I may ask the further indulgence of the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to continue his remarks for thirty minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to make it one hour.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas is recognized for thirty minutes.

Mr. BURLESON. Mr. Chairman, the New York Cotton Exchange was organized in 1870. Three years thereafter the Liverpool Cotton Exchange was brought into existence, and in 1880 the New Orleans Cotton Exchange was incorporated. Since that time the volume of operations upon these exchanges has become so tremendous that they exert a far-reaching influence upon every line of the cotton business. I thoroughly understand that the passage of a bill of the character that I have offered or the amendment here proposed, if adopted, would materially reduce the operations of these exchanges; would, in fact, strike down fully 90 per cent of the transactions taking place on the New York Cotton Exchange, and undoubtedly this result would create temporarily, at least, a widespread disturbance in trade conditions throughout the cotton-consuming and cotton-producing world. I also recognize the fact that the burden rests upon me to show that the injury resulting from this disturbance will in the end prove less hurtful to the consumer and producer of cotton than the continuance of existing conditions; and if I am not able to do this I candidly state to you that my bill deserves to fail.

In addressing myself to this subject to-day I shall direct my remarks particularly to the New York Cotton Exchange, not that I am more opposed to the New York Cotton Exchange than I am to the one at New Orleans or any other where gambling is permitted, but because I am more familiar with the rules and regulations of the New York Cotton Exchange, having made a study of them, and further, because, as is properly claimed for it, the New York Cotton Exchange is the controlling institution of that character or, as its defenders express it, the controlling market. In fact, the operations of the New York Cotton Exchange, as I shall show, are so overwhelmingly large as compared with the transactions on the others, that the resultant effects upon the interests of the producer and consumer of cotton from operations at Liverpool and New Orleans are almost negligible, and, as I shall further show, New Orleans practically but trails along in the wake of the great New York concern.

Mr. Chairman, I am not unmindful of the economic importance and benefit of a great central cotton market or exchange. Undoubtedly an exchange for cotton could render great service, not alone to the producer of cotton but also to the consumer of cotton. If it performs its legitimate functions it would constantly serve to bring the consumer and producer of cotton together. It would intelligently aid in directing the marketing of the crop at the least expense, and furthermore it would expeditiously and economically assist in distributing this great crop throughout the civilized world. The question arises now, Does the New York Cotton Exchange perform these legitimate functions of an exchange? I candidly admit that for ten years after its organization it did perform all the useful and beneficial purposes for which it was created; it accomplished to a marked degree all the purposes I have named. Mill treasurers, spinners' agents, and cotton exporters assembled at New York in great numbers for the purpose of securing their factory supplies; many producers of cotton sent their cotton from the South to commission houses in that city, using those agencies through the exchange for distributing cotton not alone to our own mills but throughout the world wherever cotton was demanded. Thus it continued for a period of about ten years, and then the New York Cotton Exchange ceased to perform the proper functions of an exchange, through no fault of its members, it is true, but as a direct result of a fixed law of modern business. This proposition I will later on conclusively demonstrate.

From that time, Mr. Chairman, about 1880, the practices of the New York Exchange have grown steadily worse and worse—more hurtful day by day—more injurious year by year—to both the producer and consumer until now, as I see it, those practices have become well-nigh intolerable and as I conscientiously believe the exchange must be either radically reformed, which I fear is impossible, or it should be totally destroyed.

Let us consider for a moment the proper functions of a legitimate cotton exchange. The chief function, as all will admit, is to bring the buyer and seller together.

Now, let me ask, Does anyone who really wants to buy or sell cotton go to the New York Cotton Exchange for that purpose?

In the course of this discussion I will show you that they do not. The next most important function of an exchange is to aid in marketing the crop at the least expense to producer and consumer. Does the New York Cotton Exchange serve this beneficial purpose?

Before I conclude I will show you that on the contrary it lays an unnecessary burden of millions of dollars on those it pretends to benefit.

The other important function of a cotton exchange is to assist in expeditiously distributing this great product throughout the world, for the time has come when an annual supply of this important staple is essential to the happiness of a majority of the world's peoples.

Who will claim that the New York Cotton Exchange renders this assistance to the cotton trade?

I will show you that its operations obstruct, hinder, and interfere with the prompt distribution of this crop throughout the cotton-consuming world.

Before addressing myself to these propositions it may be well for me to digress at this point for the purpose of making clear what has destroyed the usefulness of the New York Exchange. What is this law of business or rule of business which has destroyed the exchange? As I have stated, during the early history of the exchange large quantities of spot cotton were consigned to New York for sale to our eastern mills as well as to exporters. Exporters kept their agents there. Mill treasurers and spinners' agents assembled there in great numbers to secure their stock for manufacturing purposes. Many producers of the South sent their cotton to New York for sale, and I assert it as a fact, and statistics will show, that New York prior to 1880 was the greatest spot market for cotton in the world, save the city of New Orleans. It is no longer so. What has wrought the change? At that time we had comparatively few railroads in this country, especially in the South. It was the day of the sailing vessel. The only steamboats that touched this continent sailed from the harbors of New York and Boston. To-day the South is gridironed with railroads, and from her harbors steam vessels sail for every port in Europe, and by the utilization of the through bill of lading cotton is now sent direct, not only to every mill in the eastern section of our own country but through every port in Europe and in Asia to the factories in those countries. Geographically, as transportation facilities existed prior to 1880, New York was admirably situated to be a great distributing cotton market. It undoubtedly was such, and so continued for a number of years. It was an ideal place for a great cotton exchange; and I do not deny, but admit, that at that time the New York Cotton Exchange served all the beneficial and useful purposes of a genuine legitimate exchange.

Mr. Chairman, this propitious period in the history of the New York Cotton Exchange was before the day of "the through bill of lading." This important instrumentality of modern commerce had not at that time been brought into general use. It was not universally utilized by the commercial interests of our country as it is now.

We all know, Mr. Chairman, that modern business to be successful must practice economy both as to time and money; this is a fixed and inviolable rule, and considering the fierceness of competition from it there can be no departure if one is to survive or escape bankruptcy.

When "the through bill of lading" brought about not only a saving of time, but also a saving of the expense attendant upon stopping and handling cotton in New York City its business as a great spot cotton market was gone, never to return. It needs no argument to prove this; the mere statement of the fact is in itself a conclusive demonstration of the correctness of the proposition.

It was "the through bill of lading" that destroyed New York as a great market center for cotton.

Can I be mistaken about that? Let us see if I am supported by others in this belief. Mr. Arthur R. Marsh, one of the board of governors of the New York Cotton Exchange, and one of its ablest defenders——

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield to a question before proceeding?

Mr. BURLESON. Certainly. I invite questions from anyone desiring to ask them.

Mr. MADDEN. At the time the gentleman refers to the New York Cotton Exchange as being a great spot market, what was the volume of the cotton business of this country with Europe as compared with the present?

Mr. BURLESON. Approximately the same percentage of the crop was sent abroad then as at this time. Of course, there was not the volume of business then because we only produced at that time about 6,000,000 bales of cotton, whereas we now produce eleven, twelve, thirteen, and one time fourteen million bales of cotton.

Mr. MADDEN. How much of the cotton then produced was shipped abroad as compared with what is now shipped abroad?

Mr. BURLESON. Approximately the same percentage; in 1879–80, 31 per cent of the crop was consumed by our home mills and 69 per cent went abroad; in 1906–7, 37 per cent of the crop was taken for home consumption, 63 per cent going to foreign countries.

Now, permit me to read what Mr. Marsh, a member of the New York Cotton Exchange, in a letter addressed last year to the Atlanta Constitution, attempting to defend practices upon the exchange under its rules, had to say as to the effect of the through bill of lading. I read an excerpt therefrom as follows:

> Years ago, in the early days of the New York Cotton Exchange, New York was a market in which large quantities of all kinds of cotton were regularly carried in stock and offered for sale to spinners precisely like stocks of dry goods and other commodities which are now even carried and sold by the New York merchants. This is no longer the case, as it was discovered some twenty years ago by New England spot brokers that they could buy cotton in the South and sell it to New England spinners at practically the same price the New York merchants had to pay for their cotton delivered in New York. In other words, these New England brokers see that every bale of cotton that comes to New York and is carried in warehouses is subject to an expense of $1.50, which is not incurred if the same cotton is shipped direct from the South to the spinner. By saving this $1.50 per bale the New England broker was able to steadily undersell the New York cotton merchant and speedily capture all the old-time business in spot cotton which formerly New York controlled. Spinners ceased to come to New York in search of cotton for their mills, and the result was that the New York market was no longer able to carry at all times the considerable stock of all kinds of cotton it formerly did.

Thus you see, Mr. Chairman, that this law of business which requires every economy of time and money wrought the destruction of this great exchange, and I gladly bear witness to my belief that it was through no fault of the members of the New York Exchange that the change in the character of its business was brought about, and the adoption of its present rules and practices compelled. The gradual evolution and development of "the through bill of lading," and the geographical handicap which New York suffers brought the exchange to its present low state. I would not be candid if I did not express my belief that the New York Exchange has been forced to adopt its present rules and engage in its present pernicious methods in order to preserve its very existence. Under more favorable circumstances, with a different environment, I feel sure the New York Cotton Exchange would have scrupulously avoided—yes, would have even scorned to consider the adoption of some of its present rules or countenanced its present controlling practices. [Applause.] It is for this reason, Mr. Chairman, that in the course of this discussion I shall feel no inclination to indulge in abuse of the New York Exchange or its members, and whereas I shall criticise some of its rules and practices as being extremely hurtful to legitimate trade, I do so feeling, as I have said, that those rules and practices are necessary to preserve the existence of the exchange. I believe they would change them if they could do so and still continue to do business. It is true they exert complete control over their own rules—can modify or change them when they see fit, but human nature is human nature, and it may not be reasonable to expect them to voluntarily modify their methods of business when such action would in a large measure destroy that business. But, Mr. Chairman, if it is a fact that conditions are such as to make it impossible for the New York Cotton Exchange to operate its so-called business without doing serious injury to legitimate trade, then I think all will agree that it should go out of such business.

Mr. FITZGERALD. In order to ascertain the point of the gentleman's argument, I wish to inquire, first, upon what he bases his statement that after the first ten years the New York Exchange absolutely ceased to perform the functions of an exchange; and whether it is based on the difference in the price to the producer after the first ten years, or whether it is based upon the fluctuations of more or less violent character after the first ten years of existence?

Mr. BURLESON. Neither the price of cotton nor the fluctuation in the price of cotton had anything to do with the fact that New York ceased to be a great spot market. It ceased to be a great spot market because commerce—in 1880, or about that time—brought into general use "the through bill of lading." I addressed a communication to the secretary of the Interstate Commerce Commission to ascertain the date when the through bill of lading was first used and he informed me that it was some time between 1875 and 1880. Its use saved $1.50 on every bale of cotton theretofore stopped in New York. It was then that the Yankee spinner in the East, the shrewdest, smartest individual who was ever developed on this earth, saw that this saving could be effected by the use of the through bill of lading and, adopting it, he ceased to go to New York to purchase his mill supply.

Mr. Chairman, there can be no question that the adoption of the through bill of lading destroyed the New York Cotton Exchange as a real exchange, and all the claims and protestations of its members and defenders can't make it one. In days gone by, as I have said, it was a great spot market and frequently its annual receipts reached millions of bales.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Now will the gentleman say how much cotton he believes should be delivered in New York in order to make it a proper cotton market?

Mr. BURLESON. If the gentleman will permit me to develop my argument I will reach that phase of the subject, but I will say to him it has not received sufficient for several years; that year before last only 6,000 bales of spot cotton were received in that great market and last year less than 24,000 bales. [Applause.]

Mr. FITZGERALD. I do not want to interfere with the development of the gentleman's argument, but I shall be able to demonstrate that his figures are wrong.

Mr. BURLESON. That will be impossible for you to do. I take my figures from statistics prepared by members of the exchange, but nobody will welcome the gentleman to a discussion of those figures more than I.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield to me for an inquiry?

Mr. BURLESON. Certainly.

Mr. MADDEN. I understand the gentleman substantially said, although he did not say so in terms, that the price of cotton was lower now than it was before so much speculation began.

Mr. BURLESON. Oh, no; it is lower now than it sometimes was before speculation controlled the price, and higher now than it was at other times before that period. The gentleman knows that immediately after the civil war cotton sold at $1 and $1.20 a pound. That was before the organization of the New York Cotton Exchange; but later on I will quote to the gentleman from members of the New York Cotton Exchange, itself, showing the effect of its operations upon the market price of the actual cotton.

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman admits, I suppose, there has been more speculation in cotton during the last ten years than the prior ten years?

Mr. BURLESON. Undoubtedly.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman also admit, that the price of cotton has been $15 a bale higher the last ten years, during all this era of great speculation, than ten years prior to that?

Mr. BURLESON. Certainly. I make that admission, because it is a fact. Commodities of all kinds have advanced during the past ten years and will continue to advance as long as gold production increases. There may be temporary depressions in price, but the trend will continue upward, and I sincerely and honestly believe that but for the stupendous gambling operations in the New York Cotton Exchange during that period the farmers of the South would have received from five to ten dollars a bale more for their cotton (applause), and the United States itself would have been enriched by receiving 500 million or a billion dollars more in gold for its export cotton than it received——

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him one more question?

Mr. BURLESON. Certainly.

Mr. MADDEN. Just this one. I am not going to consume too much of the gentleman's time. The gentleman admits that there has been more speculation in the New York Cotton Exchange during the last ten years than prior to that. He also admits that the average price of cotton has been $15 per bale more on account of speculation than before.

Mr. BURLESON and others. Oh, no.

Mr. MADDEN. During this era of speculation, put it, then.

Mr. BURLESON. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. And at the same time he makes the statement if it were not for the speculation, notwithstanding the higher price on account of speculation, the people who are now raising cotton and the American people would have received millions more. How does the gentleman reconcile those statements on that subject?

Mr. BURLESON. I do not admit that the increase in price is due to speculation; in fact it came in spite of it. When I reach that part of my argument I will show my friend from Illinois, to his satisfaction, even out of the mouths of members of the cotton exchange itself, that their rules and practices have actually depressed the price of cotton. [Applause.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, let us revert to the issue whether the New York Cotton Exchange is serving, or can serve, any of the legitimate and proper purposes of a genuine exchange. First, does it serve to bring the buyer and the seller together? Would any cotton manufacturer, who is, of course, the real consumer and buyer of the farmer's cotton, think of going to the New York Exchange to buy his stock of cotton for factory purposes? To ask the question is to answer it—we know he does not. And neither the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] nor the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] will have the effrontery (if I could use such a word in connection with either of these gentlemen) to make such a claim. Why do the buyers not go there? I will show you why. First, for factory purposes, the mill man needs cotton of even running grades. He can't get this cotton through the New York Exchange. There are but 11 grades of cotton, and yet, according to the rules of the New York Cotton Exchange, in force prior to the first day of this month, the delivery of from 19 to 20 half and quarter grades was permitted, making, altogether, about 30 different grades of cotton deliverable on contract. Under the New York Cotton Exchange contract the buyer is liable to receive all 30 of these different grades of cotton in one purchase of a hundred bales. No manufacturer could possibly utilize to the best advantage 30 different grades of cotton in his mills. The improbability of a cotton spinner going to the New York Exchange for his raw material, if he wants to use a low-grade cotton in his particular mill, is easily understood when you know that under the exchange contract he buys at the seller's option, and if he demanded its fulfillment it would result in his receiving probably a score of different grades. Remember, these grades are all of different value—the higher grades frequently commanding $15 per bale more than bales of lower grade. Thus you see if he used cotton of the lower grade only in his mill he would be at a needless expense for every bale of a higher grade delivered to him under this contract. For the higher-grade cotton received under this contract he would be incurring a useless expense, as his mill calls for cotton of low grade. And if what has been charged is true, of the low-grade cotton received some would probably be unspinable.

Now, Mr. Chairman, if, as is usually the case with Northern mills, a higher grade of cotton is required, the spinner could not buy through the New York Exchange at all, for the lower grades delivered under the contract, at seller's option, would be for his purposes absolutely worthless.

Mr. MADDEN. The seller's option does not mean that the buyer must not take the goods, does it?

Mr. BURLESON. Oh, no; and later on I will show you that the buyer never does take the goods—the cotton. Let me read from the contract itself. I read from the charter, by-laws, and rules of the New York Cotton Exchange:

The delivery within such time to be at the seller's option, in one warehouse, upon notice to the buyer as provided by the by-laws and rules of the New York Cotton Exchange, the cotton to be of any grade from good ordinary to fair, inclusive.

It says at "the option of the seller," so that under this contract cotton from the lowest grade they sell to the highest grade that can possibly be bought is deliverable.

I now read section 93 of the charter and by-laws of the New York Cotton Exchange:

SEC. 93. No contract for the future delivery of cotton shall be recognized, acknowledged, or enforced by the Exchange, or any committee or officer thereof, unless both parties thereto shall be members of the New York Cotton Exchange, and the contract shall be in the following form, viz:

NEW YORK COTTON EXCHANGE.

CONTRACT.

New York, ———, I, ———, in consideration of one dollar in hand paid, receipt of which is hereby acknowledged, ——— have this day sold to (or bought from) ——— 50,000 pounds in about 100 square bales of cotton, growth of the United States, deliverable from licensed warehouse, in the port of New York, between the first and last days of ——— next, inclusive. The delivery within such time to be at seller's option in one warehouse, upon notice to buyer, as provided by the by-laws and rules of the New York Cotton Exchange. The cotton to be of any grade from good ordinary to fair, inclusive, and if tinged, not below low middling tinged, or if stained, not below strict low middling stained (New York Cotton Exchange inspection and classification) at the price of — cents per pound for middling, with additions or deductions for other grades, according to the rates of the New York Cotton Exchange existing on the day previous to the date of the transferable notice of delivery.

Either party to have the right to call for a margin, as the variations of the market for like deliveries may warrant, and which margin shall be kept good. This contract is made in view of, and in all respects subject to, the rules and conditions established by the New York Cotton Exchange, and in full accordance with section 92 of the by-laws.

——— ———.

There it is, you see that under this contract it is at the option of the seller. He has the right to deliver any grade he sees fit to deliver. Consider also the depressing influence this must exert on the price of cotton. Now, suppose a spinner uses low-grade cotton. If he insisted on receiving the cotton under his contract he is liable under the terms of this contract to receive a number of bales of cotton of a higher grade than his particular mill requires, thus incurring an unnecessary expense. Of course he will not buy these. Now, suppose he wanted a high-grade cotton. I will show you from letters which I expect to read later on that some mills use the very high grades of cotton. Suppose a spinner wanted cotton of that kind. I hold in my hand a New York Cotton Exchange warehouse certificate for 138,484 bales of cotton. If a mill man whose mill required cotton grading as high as "middling" and above, bought contracts for the entire 138,484 bales, he would get only 602 bales that he could use. Suppose a manufacturer required for his particular mill cotton of middling grade and one grade above and one below middling, how many bales do you suppose he could get that would be of use to him by buying the entire lot of cotton in New York Exchange warehouses on the date of this certificate for 138,484 bales? Only 2,703 bales; the remaining 135,781 bales he could not use in his mill. If at any time a manufacturer should insist on receiving the actual cotton under one of these contracts, the seller, who has the option, as I have shown, would always see to it that the manufacturer got just the grade of cotton he did not want and could not use. In order that the accuracy of my statements may be verified I embody in my remarks the certificate, which shows also the differences between grades as fixed by the revision committee.

GEORGE BRENNECKE,
Chairman Warehouse and Delivery Committee.

Now, gentlemen, permit me to submit this plain appeal to your common sense. If the cotton buyer, the spinner, could get the cotton he really wanted on the New York Cotton Exchange, or if he could get cotton there that he could use, even if it were not the exact character of cotton called for by his mill, don't you know he would buy there?

Frequently futures on the exchange sell from 1 to 1½ cents per pound lower than spots can be bought in the South. If the mill man bought on the New York Exchange not only would he be able to save from $5 to $10 per bale on the cotton he consumes, but he would also save the freight thereon, which would not be an inconsiderable sum if he consumed annually, as my friend Mr. Lovering and associates do, 200,000 bales of cotton. Mr. Chairman, there is a growing demand for finer cotton goods. Each year the trade is demanding more and more of the finer yarns, and to meet this demand cotton of a higher grade is essential. Many Northern mills now require a cotton having a staple 1¼ inches long, and yet this factor, the length of the staple, which materially enters into the value of cotton, is not considered at all in the New York Cotton Exchange contract. This fact alone would keep prudent progressive spinners away from there. Mr. Chairman, I challenge the production of one spinner, either North or South, who goes to the New York Exchange to buy his cotton for factory purposes. Under any contract he could buy there he would not know what grade of cotton he might receive.

Have you any further doubt on this point? If so, permit me to read from a letter to me from Mr. Theophilus Parsons, president of the Arkwright Club, the oldest organization of cotton consumers in the United States.

Mr. NORRIS. I wanted to ask the gentleman a question about the certificate he referred to. Does the gentleman mean to convey the impression that the buyer would make a contract for one kind of cotton and have tendered him under the contract different grades?

Mr. BURLESON. That is exactly what I mean; by the terms of this contract cotton basis middling is sold, and at the option of the seller, if delivery was demanded, the buyer could be compelled to take as many as thirty different grades of cotton.

Mr. NORRIS. And the buyer could not make any other kind of a contract?

Mr. BURLESON. He could not. This contract is the only one that is permissible under the rules of the New York Cotton Exchange.

Now, gentlemen, my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. LOVERING] knows who Theophilus Parsons is. As I said to you, he is president of the Arkwright Club, a great organization composed of cotton consumers.

Mr. BENNET of New York. Will the gentleman yield? I want to ask him to make a correction. It is the Arkwright mills.

Mr. BURLESON. No, it is the Arkwright Club.

Mr. BENNET of New York. The Arkwright Club is a great consumer, but not of cotton. [Laughter.]

Mr. BURLESON. It is one of the greatest organizations of cotton consumers in this country; am I not right?

Mr. BENNET of New York. "Organization of cotton consumers," that is correct.

Mr. BURLESON. Mr. Parsons's letter is in reply to one from me in which I propounded certain questions. My first and fourth questions I now read:

1. Do you in the conduct of your business as a cotton manufacturer find it necessary frequently to resort to the future markets of New York and New Orleans as a means of protecting yourself against unforeseen fluctuations in the price of raw cotton?

4. Does the existing apparent disparity between the price of future contracts and the price of middling cotton in the South and elsewhere operate to the advantage or disadvantage of the manufacturer?

Hear his answer to these questions, and by his permission I use his letter.

In answer to the first question I use the word "never" for the reason that the manufacturer, when he buys middling upland cotton in the New York or New Orleans Cotton Exchange, has not any idea whatever what he is buying. They can tender a cotton spinner straw, cotton seed, or even the wood of the cotton plant, all mixed together, at a difference in price, the value of which stuff no living man is able to determine.

Mr. Chairman, who here will contend further that the buyer of cotton can go to the New York Exchange for his mill supply? I read further from this letter—

By having thousands of bales of this material in store in the two large cities they are able to manipulate the market in such a way that I answer your fourth question that the member of the stock exchange makes his money on so-called "differences."

Here is the president of the greatest organization of cotton consumers in the world declaring over his signature that the members of these cotton exchanges make their money, not in legitimate speculation, but on so-called differences. [Applause.] The letter further says:

They can manipulate these "differences" with the stock of trash they have on hand.

Some years ago you will find that many mill treasurers in the United States favored encouraging the future market, and this was quite right, for at that time grades such as "stains," "gin cut," and so forth, were not permitted for differences, and the spinnner could use cotton that was tendered to him. But, like everything else, they have "killed the goose that laid the golden egg," and have made their rule such that they can deliver trash which it is impossible to spin. This will eventually work to their disadvantage and possibly kill their business. They will then reform their rules.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman be allowed to conclude his remarks. Nothing more interesting or more important has ever been heard on this floor.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I will have to object to that request. I will ask that the gentleman's time be extended until 3 o'clock.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request that the gentleman's time be extended until 3 o'clock?

There was no objection.

Mr. BURLESON. Mr. Chairman, for fear that I may not be able to conclude all I want to say, I ask that I be permitted to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask the gentleman from Texas if he will also discuss the letters he has from Charles D. White and Bemis Brothers?

Mr. BURLESON. I intend to discuss the Bemis letter if I have time to reach it. It was published as an open letter to me in the New York Journal of Commerce, and I take that as permission to use it. The other letter referred to by my friend from New York I wired for permission to use, and it will give me pleasure to comment upon it. Mr. Chairman, I have absolutely no desire to evade anything in this discussion, and if I had the time I would invite interruptions, because, I pledge you my word, I try to keep an open mind on this question; and if I can be convinced that it is for the interest of the producer and consumer of cotton to continue in existence these exchanges, I will support and defend them; otherwise I will stand here as long as I am a Member of Congress insisting upon their destruction. [Applause.]

Now, let us see further: Does the seller, I mean the man who has the actual cotton, go to the New York Exchange to find his market? I have just shown you that the buyer of real cotton is not to be found there. Who would he sell to? Furthermore, why should he go there? I have just shown you, according to Mr. Arthur R. Marsh, that it costs the seller $1.50 for every bale he carries there; why should he voluntarily go there to sustain this loss? He does not do so. Now, Mr. Chairman, if the buyer can not go there and the seller will not go there, will some ingenious friend and defender of this colossal gambling shop, this so-called "exchange," explain how it performs the chief function of a legitimate exchange by bringing together the buyer and the seller—the consumer and producer of cotton? With these incontestible facts staring us in the face, it would be an insult to the intelligence of this body for any such effort to be made.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield for another question?

Mr. BURLESON. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MADDEN. If the cotton exchanges of our country were abolished, would not that lead to the quotations of prices in the Liverpool Exchange?

Mr. BURLESON. Mr. Chairman, if any man is entitled to be called the father of the New York Cotton Exchange, that man is Mr. Walter T. Miller; he was a charter member and the chairman of the committee who directed the construction of the palatial building in which the cotton exchange is housed. He is probably its oldest member and is universally respected for his integrity and ability as a cotton factor. I submit to you, by way of reply to my friend from Illinois, a declaration made by Mr. Miller to me in the presence of the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LOVERING], and my friend, the able Representative from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS.] When that question, now asked by the gentleman from Illinois, was put directly to Mr. Miller he promptly replied: "If you should close the New York Exchange the Liverpool Exchange would certainly go out of business." He is the greatest authority on cotton exchanges and cotton-exchange methods in this country if long experience makes one an authority.

Mr. MADDEN. The Liverpool Exchange being a manufacturer's exchange, would it not likely reduce the price of cotton if all exchanges in this country were abolished?

Mr. BURLESON. Mr. Chairman, when I reach that part of my argument, when I discuss the effect of the rules and practices of these exchanges on the price of spot cotton, I will show that frequently the Liverpool Exchange quotes prices for cotton of a given grade very much higher than the price fixed by the exchanges in this country for the same grade. At last we must all admit that the ultimate price for cotton, as with everything else, is fixed by the law of supply and demand.

I have not the least doubt, if we could enact the legislation proposed, and suppress all gambling in cotton, it would force these exchanges to a change of their methods or it might close them; and if so, I feel sure the intelligent spinners of New England and the South, and the spinners abroad, would adopt some method of securing their mill stock probably more satisfactory to them than the present one. This, I think, I can show the gentleman if I have the time to read from their own letters.

Now, let us see if the New York Cotton Exchange performs the other beneficial functions of a real exchange. Does it aid in marketing the cotton at the lowest cost to the parties at interest?

It may be interesting first to know exactly how much cotton has been received in recent years at New York, this great market center, this very important exchange. The figures I now use are taken from a book prepared by one of the numerous defenders of the New York Exchange and its practices, published by Latham, Alexander & Co., of New York. This book shows there was received at New York in 1900–1901, 205,859 bales; in 1901–2, 161,964 bales; in 1902–3, 57,577 bales; in 1903–4, 45,123 bales; in 1904–5, 33,798 bales; in 1905–6, only 6,575 bales, and in 1906–7, 23,108 bales. Thus we see that from year to year New York has been gradually declining in its annual receipts until it is now receiving a quantity so insignificant that but for its vast operations in paper cotton it would scarcely be reported. This exchange could not render much aid in marketing the cotton crop if the cotton did not go there, could it?

Mr. SIMS. And the largest crops ever grown were grown during this period.

Mr. BURLESON. Yes; the largest in the history of the trade. Cotton has ceased to go to New York, and surely it can not be contended that this exchange could render aid in marketing the crop when it is admitted by the exchange apologists that the cotton no longer goes there. But, Mr. Chairman, some one may still claim that, notwithstanding the fact that cotton no longer seeks New York as a market place, the operation of the New York Cotton Exchange is still helpful to the producer in marketing his crop. If so, the question at once arises, Does it do so at the least expense or in the most economical manner for the seller and buyer? We all know that there are 450 members of this exchange, membership being limited to that number.

We all know that these gentleman are not running this exchange for their health, and that, first and last, regardless of what else may be claimed or contended for, this all must admit that the burden of the expense of this exchange ultimately falls on the producers and consumers of cotton, and, doubtless, frequently they make both pay the same bill. These members of the exchange, being cotton brokers, maintain many high-priced, handsomely furnished offices in this expensive city, some operating private telegraph lines to wire houses and local agents throughout the country, with innumerable typewriters and stenographers, all of whom must be supported and all of which must be paid for. I need not ask who finally does the paying. It goes without saying that the man with the hoe and the spinner who finally consumes the cotton pay the freight. And is this all? I only wish is were. Let us look a little further. During last year, as can be shown through compilation of statements published in the leading newspapers from day to day—and that is the only way the figures can be had now—statistics were published by the exchange prior to 1897, but since then it has not done so for reasons which I will hereafter state—there was sold on the New York Cotton Exchange 100,000,000 bales of cotton. Now, Mr. Chairman, if the buyer did not go there to get actual cotton, and the seller did not carry there cotton for sale, what do these vast transactions really represent? There can be no doubt about what it was. It was phantom cotton, paper-contract cotton, spook cotton, and yet, gentlemen, for every 100 bales of this mythical cotton sold there through members of the New York Cotton Exchange a burden of $7.50 was placed on the real cotton crop. Seven dollars and fifty cents are charged as commissions on every 100 bales bought or sold on the exchange. These commissions alone amount to $7,500,000 per annum. Is this all? I only wish it were. Mr. Chairman, it takes a vast amount of money to finance these transactions—not based on actual cotton, it is true—I have shown that the actual cotton does not go to New York—nevertheless, the burden of all this expense rests on the actual crop.

Consider for a moment the money required for these transactions. If $2 per bale is required by way of margin on each transaction of 100 bales, the buyer and seller between them put up $400. It is a simple matter of calculation to arrive at the result showing that first and last on 50,000,000 bales of cotton $100,000,000 would be required in margins from the seller and a like amount from the buyer. Of course these vast sums are not all required at one and the same time, but when it is used some one pays interest thereon. Now, if a fluctuation in price takes place, a further margin is required; for every twenty points an additional dollar per bale must be put up. And if a violent fluctuation occurs and a change of as much as 100 points is made in the market price, it would represent on the year's transaction one quarter of a billion dollars. I would not have you believe for a moment that any such sum of money or credit is called in use at one time, but during the cotton season covering the full year this vast sum in the aggregate may be required, and if so, some one pays tribute therefor in the way of interest. What in the way of additional burden does this place on the actual crop? It staggers one who attempts to make the calculation. Undoubtedly the producer, the farmer, and the consumer, the manufacturer, between them bear all these charges.

Mr. Chairman, a few days since we all received through the mails a forty-four page pamphlet containing an elaborate defense of the New York Cotton Exchange by Latham, Alexander & Co. In it I find this:

> As the Burleson bill and other bills proposed in Congress to suppress the cotton exchanges of the country and transactions in cotton contracts for future delivery are simply a rehash of the antioption bill of 1892, we republish herewith our reply to Senator George's argument, which covered the entire subject.

Now, as a matter of fact, my bill is based on entirely different principles from the bill of 1892 and this I will show when I come to discuss its details, but that is not what I now am after. Let us turn to that part of this reply answering as to the burden placed on the cotton crop by these commissions and interest charges on money required for margins and see what answer is made. I read from the reply:

> Now, when it is remembered that a large part of the business transacted in the exchange is done by bankers, merchants, exporters, and traders who are members of the exchange, and who pay no commissions, it is not likely the total commission on the total transactions quoted amounted to one-fourth of the sum mentioned by the Senator.

Thus we have it that on a large part of the transactions on the New York Cotton Exchange no commissions are paid. So far the reply in part controverts the complaint made as to the burdens of the commissions.

Now let us see what is said about the expense of interest charges incurred by the margins required to be put up by those contracting for future delivery of cotton. I read from this same reply:

> Bankers, merchants, brokers, and dealers who are members of the New York Cotton Exchange rarely call upon each other for original margins. They have the right to do so, but the right is not exercised, because their contracts are considered safe, and, besides, they have the right at all times to call upon each other for margins to cover any variation in the market. Calling of either an original margin or margin on account of variations in the market is purely discretionary with the dealer. Firms in the exchange oftentimes have large transactions with each other without margins being called.

This answer shows that interest charges do not accrue on the margins of some transactions taking place on the exchange.

But, Mr. Chairman, taking these two answers together, we have this defender of the exchange making a more serious charge against the exchange than the one which he is defending. Here we have it that innumerable transactions take place on the floor of the cotton exchange where neither commissions are paid nor margins required. What a temptation this affords, Mr. Chairman, for members of the exchange to play battledoor and shuttlecock with the market price of this great product. There they stand day after day, without danger of incurring more than a slight liability, beating down if they see fit the market price of a great crop which is made through the sweat of millions of our people! This tends to confirm a statement which I was loath to believe, contained in a letter from New York and recently received by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN]. I read from the letter:

In this way this "gang" have milked millions of money out of the public. Ninety-eight per cent of the dealings here are merely gambling. They would at times pass the word around, "How much long cotton have you on your books," then compare notes and finding that the lambs or outsiders had 500,000 bales long they would start a bear raid and smash the market until these longs would have to sell out or "let go"; just then the "gang" would buy from the lamb thus frozen out, and when he was cleaned out of his money, push the market rapidly up so as to not let him get in again at the bottom.

How easy it would be to do this in the light of the statements made in this so-called defense of the New York Cotton Exchange. Thus we find the exchange impaled on one horn of the dilemma or the other—either is monstrous. The truth is, Mr. Chairman, it renders no aid in marketing this great crop, but during the period it is being marketed this exchange lays a burden on it excessively heavy, which burden the buyer and seller have determined to no longer willingly carry.

Mr. Chairman, in discussing this question I want to be absolutely fair. I realize that I must be fair.

Every error I fall into here will ultimately be pointed out and used to strengthen the opposition to what we are endeavoring to accomplish—the abolishing of this great evil.

The business of these members of the exchange is placed in jeopardy by the legislation proposed, and not only are they shrewd and smart themselves, but they have the means to employ the greatest talent this country affords, and every misstatement I may make, through inadvertence or ignorance, will be in the end turned against us.

For this reason, Mr. Chairman, I am not venturing into the field of speculation, but am tying myself down to facts, and whenever I can I will use testimony they have furnished themselves to demonstrate the injury resulting from the practices of these exchanges. Now, let us look further to see if the New York Exchange performs the other functions of a legitimate cotton exchange.

Does it assist expeditiously and economically in the distribution throughout the world of the product of 5,000,000 of our people who are engaged in growing cotton?

We all recognize the truth of the proposition that stability of price is one of the first essentials of healthy trade.

Now what effect do the operations on the New York Cotton Exchange have on the price of cotton? Mr. Chairman, the mere propounding of this query brings to every mind at all familiar with the cotton trade the thought of erratic prices.

But in order to do no injustice let us examine the statistics on this subject. I hold in my hand Shepperson's Cotton Facts—a book sent out by the superintendent of the exchange, as is shown on the cover. It is prepared by an able cotton expert.

This book shows that for last year, taking each month as I call them, from the time deliveries for that month were dealt in until the close of that month, the price fluctuated as follows: For September, from 11.18 cents per pound to 8.58. Remember, now, that this price is for the same grade of cotton. For October, from 11.30 cents to 8.60 cents per pound; November, from 11.70 to 8.85; December, 11.30 to 8.90; January, 11.31 to 8.99; February, 11.40 to 9.06; March, 11.48 to 9.02; and thus throughout the year, for July the highest being 13 cents and the lowest 9.35 cents per pound. Thus you see that these prices are either manipulated or the unrestrained speculation keeps the market price shifting round like a howling dervish—jumping like a man with the jim-jams. It serves to disturb prices rather than to steady them, and this is continued from the beginning of the season to its end. The producer of cotton is kept halting between his hope of a higher price and his fear of a lower one. He knows not whether to sell or to hold. As he labors through the week preparing his crop for market, the price may be thoroughly satisfactory and at its close, when he is in a position to sell, he may find it off by a hundred points. The price lacking in stability, he holds perhaps to lose still more in the end. Do such practices aid in distributing the crop expeditiously? On the contrary, it has hindered it as I have shown. Mr. Chairman, recall the effect on trade conditions during 1904—the Sully year, as it is called. Then, as we all know, after the bulk of the cotton had passed out of the hands of the farmer into the possession of the middlemen, the price was by speculative methods forced to nearly 18 cents for middling cotton, resulting in many of the mills closing down.

Do such practices aid in distributing the crop expeditiously? Just the contrary. It obstructs it as is shown. Again, during the year before, through a combination of cotton speculators, the price of cotton was, near the end of the season, forced to so high a figure that some cotton which had been exported was returned from Europe and, as I have been told, actually tendered on contracts.

Thus as a direct result of the manipulation of prices on this controlling exchange we find cotton more valuable for gambling purposes than it is for spinning purposes. This, of course, again demonstrates conclusively that the New York exchange aids materially in distributing this great crop where it is needed at the least cost to those interested! Some one paid for the extra trip of this cotton across the seas. The extra trip was occasioned by the wild speculation on this so-called "exchange,' thus interfering with the crop's final distribution. Hence we see that the New York Cotton Exchange has ceased to perform any of the functions of a useful or legitimate exchange.

If I am right about this, if this exchange no longer serves to bring buyer and seller together, imposes useless burdens on the producer and consumer, and obstructs, hinders, and delays the marketing of this important crop, the inquiry arises, Why should we not abolish it or enact legislation to prevent its hurtful practices? If you want to do so, the adoption of this amendment will accomplish that end.

But, Mr. Chairman, whenever a suggestion of legislation of this character is made we always find three time-worn stock arguments brought forward and urged in support of the continuance of cotton exchanges:

First. It is vehemently claimed that this cotton exchange is absolutely essential to the successful conduct of the cotton manufacturer's business; that the spinner could not safely operate without the protection afforded thereby; that the practice of the trade here and abroad is to sell the forward output of the mill, and when he has done this, for his own protection he must hedge against any material advance in the price of his raw material, and that the exchange is the only place he can make this "hedge," as it is called.

The first fact I desire to direct attention to is the probable extent of hedging by the manufacturer. We consume in this country of a 13,000,000-bale crop less than 6,000,000 bales. For the sake of argument, we will say all this is hedged, though, as I will show you hereafter, many manufacturers do not hedge. It is probable that half of this 6,000,000 is hedged in New Orleans and Liverpool, but this I waive, and in order to be within safe bounds I allow for hedging done by the cotton buyer against loss before he places cotton purchased by him an equal amount, and thus we have 12,000,000 bales hedged out of a total of 100,000,000 bales bought and sold last year on the New York Exchange, leaving 88,000,000 bales representing gambling, pure and simple.

Furthermore, I want to direct your attention to the fact, that in order to conduct a successful hedging operation it is absolutely necessary that your contract price for your futures be kept close to the market price of spots. Now, I submit, how could this be done during the past few years, when there is so marked a difference in the prices of spots and futures? Bearing on this, I want to read from an address I heard last May before the American Cotton Manufacturers' Association. It was delivered by one who has had more experience in transactions on the cotton exchange than any man living or dead, and who, in my opinion, is one of the world's greatest cotton experts. I allude to Mr. Theodore H. Price, and this is what he said:

The spinner sells his goods for delivery during January, 1908. He desires to protect himself against any radical fluctuations in the market for the raw material. The past year's experience has shown that the New York contract affords no protection. It has declined largely as a result of these fixed differences, while the price of cotton which the spinner required has advanced.

And still it is claimed the exchange is the shield and protection of the mill man. If so, Mr. Chairman, he ought to be the most loyal friend and supporter of the exchange. If he is, who would know that fact with certainty? Why, the exchange itself, and of course the chief officers of the exchange—its presidents. Let us see. I read from an address by a former president of the exchange delivered last year in Boston before the spinners themselves. He said:

The hostile attitude taken by the spinners of New England at the formation of our exchange, and which has continued with more or less intensity during the past thirty-six years was, and is, to my mind, a mistaken policy, which the spinners of England and continental Europe have avoided by their daily intercourse with merchants from all portions of the world.

Surely, Mr. Chairman, these mill men should not be hostile to their protectors who serve them so well.

Now, let us go to the presidents of the cotton manufacturing associations and have their testimony on this point. Mr. S. B. Tanner is the president of the American Cotton Manufacturers' Association, and, in reply to a letter from me, had this to say on this point:

In reply to your favor of the 17th ultimo, which came during my absence, I beg to say that I have been informed that there is very little hedging done in the New York cotton market at present, as the New York cotton market and the Southern spot markets have been so far apart during the past few years; however, up to eight or ten years ago it seems it was a safe proposition to use the New York market for hedging purposes, as the contracts were so arranged at that time that the future markets, especially the current and succeeding months, usually represented very closely the prices of spot cotton in the South, but for some reason this parity has not been maintained during the past few years.

If the New York cotton market could be so arranged as to represent the cost of spot cotton it would no doubt be a great advantage to manufacturers and dealers in spot cotton generally for hedging purposes, as the manufacturer could sell a lot of goods and probably not be able to buy any spot cotton immediately, but could base his sales upon the price of cotton in New York, buying the contracts promptly and do a safe business, which has not been the case during the past few years.

For many years Mr. J. R. MacColl was president of the New England Cotton Manufacturers' Association, and while holding that position he appeared before the Agricultural Committee at one of its hearings, and on this subject had this to say:

Mr. MACCOLL. My opinion is that the spinners of this country have used the future market to a very small extent. Lately they have been forced to use it more, but they have not used it to any large extent in years gone by. There are thousands and thousands of manufacturers who have never bought a bale of futures.

Mr. SIMS. Is it not a fact that the speculators are divided into bulls and bears, and that the effect of their operations is nil?

Mr. MACCOLL. If there is no evil about it, it is not worth while for us to waste time about it. We think it has been a tremendous evil in the last three or four years.

Mr. Chairman, during February of this year I wrote to many of the leading cotton manufacturers of our country propounding to them four questions tending to throw some light on the issue I am now discussing. To these letters I received a great many replies, and these I carried to the Census Bureau, and through the courtesy of its officials a tabulated statement was prepared giving a summary of their replies. I submit it for your consideration:

Memorandum for Hon. A. S. Burleson, prepared by the Census Bureau.

	Disadvantage	68
	Indefinite	27

I desire to direct your especial attention to the fact that 68 per cent of the manuacturers answering declare that in their opinion the disparity between the price of futures and spots is to the disadvantage of the manufacturer. This disparity in price has existed for several years, and in my opinion will continue to exist until the methods of the exchange and its rules are modified.

I also desire to read a few letters from the most prominent of these manufacturers who evidence a thorough grasp of this subject. The first I will read is from one of the strongest mill men in New England. I reserve his name, as I do not have his permission to use it. In his letter to me he said:

I have been connected with cotton for the past forty years—twenty years as a cotton buyer in New Orleans, and twenty as a cotton manufacturer.

I am opposed to the cotton-future business; it is simply gambling and does more harm than the Louisiana lottery ever did.

Not 5 per cent of the transactions in futures in the cotton exchange are anything more than gambling on quotations, with no thought on the part of buyer or seller of ever receiving or delivering actual cotton.

All sorts of fake reports in regard to size and condition of the cotton crop are circulated by the bull and bear speculators, which affect the stability of price, so important to the cotton manufacturer, and a majority of the cotton planters are very much opposed to these operations in cotton futures.

It seems to me to be the plain duty of our Government to enact laws that will check, if not entirely stop, this trading in cotton futures.

You will note, Mr. Chairman, that this gentleman in this letter also supports my contention that the New York exchange destroys stability of price, which is essential to healthy trade.

I now submit one from Wisconsin:

COOPER UNDERWEAR CO.,
Kenosha, Wis., December 17, 1907.

Congressman A. S. BURLESON,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: We wish to address you upon the subject of your bill prohibiting the speculative dealing in cotton. We wish to state that the buying and selling of cotton on margins is a very pernicious practice, and one detrimental to the interest of the cotton manufacturers of the country. There can be no objection to the actual buying of cotton where the entire value on the cotton is paid, but the speculative trading in cotton on margins we find to be a great handicap to our business.

There are two mills in this city spinning cotton. The fluctuation in the cost of our product of 1 cent per pound is a very serious fluctuation, as it unsettles prices and makes it very difficult for us indeed to plan our business or to plan our work to such an advantage that we can pay the best wages to our employees.

Under speculative manipulation the cotton market is apt to vary from half a cent to a cent in one week, and to make ourselves safe it is absolutely impossible for us to pay the highest wages because we must keep a margin of safety which we would not need to keep were it not for the speculative manipulation of prices of cotton.

It is no unusual thing under present conditions for the entire margin on cotton goods to be wiped out by the sudden speculative changes in the market. This is not conducive to the best interest of the manufacturers, who are the mainstay of the country.

We sincerely trust you will meet with success in pushing your bill to adoption. We thank you for your interest in the matter, which certainly ought to have the hearty support of all cotton manufacturers. Do not allow brokers or speculators to make you believe that the provisions of your bill are too sweeping. All that is needed by the manufacturer is that the entire speculation in cotton on margins be forever destroyed and wiped out. Again wishing you success, we remain,

Very truly, yours,

COOPER UNDERWEAR CO.,
HENRY S. COOPER,
President and Treasurer.

This gentleman also supports me in the proposition that the exchange unsettles prices, and asserts emphatically that the selling of cotton on margins is detrimental to the interests of the cotton manufacturer and is hurtful to the laborer in that it depresses his wages.

This one comes from a large manufacturer in the State of Rhode Island:

MANVILLE COMPANY,
Providence, R. I., February 22, 1908.

Mr. A. S. BURLESON, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I have your favor of the 17th instant, and inclose a reply to the printed questions attached thereto. In addition would say that it seems to me that the reason the cotton exchange awakens so much more opposition than the stock exchange or grain exchange is because that unlike those other exchanges it professes to sell an article and then makes the conditions attending the sale such that the legitimate trader can not purchase on the exchange and get an article suitable for his wants. As a result the legitimate sales steadily decrease and the exchange degenerates into a gambling place pure and simple. If a man buys a block of stock on the stock exchange or a bushel of corn or wheat on the corn exchange he gets what he buys, and consumers make use of those exchanges for their future wants.

If a spinner buys cotton futures on the cotton exchange and demands the cotton he is sure to get what he does not want if the seller can possibly effect that result. The remedy seems to me to make different grades to be sold and hold the seller to deliver what he sells, then both planters and spinners can use the exchange with safety.

A suggestion has been made by a Southern dealer that the exchange should be compelled to make two different classes of sales.

Number 1 should mean that the seller could deliver middling and above cotton with staple not less than 1 1/16-inch, or possibly 1 inch.

Number 2 should mean that the seller could deliver middling and below of similar staples. In this way the fine and coarse spinners could both be accommodated, the legitimate sales on the exchange be increased, and that would soon remove the disparity of which all complain and to which you allude in your fourth question.

I hope I have made myself plain to you.

Yours, very truly, CHAS. H. MERRIMANN.

You will note that this gentleman asserts in his letter that legitimate trade has steadily decreased on the exchanges, and that it has degenerated into a gambling place pure and simple. He also supports me in my charge that if a spinner buys a contract and demands the cotton he is sure to get what he does not want.

I now read one from Indiana:

EVANSVILLE COTTON MANUFACTURING COMPANY,
Evansville, Ind., February 25, 1908.

A. S. BURLESON, M. C.,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I am in receipt of your letter of the 17th, inclosing copy of a bill which you have recently introduced in the House of Representatives.

Inclosed herewith find the questions answered, as you request.

I believe the bill which you have introduced is just and right, and so far as our observation has been we consider the matter of dealing in futures in cotton to be detrimental to the manufacturer in every respect, as it is a form of gambling which misrepresents facts, and is harmful to anyone who is in any way connected with such doubtful methods of business.

If you have a copy of your address before the American Cotton Manufacturer's Association in Philadelphia, delivered last May, I would thank you for a copy of same.

Yours, truly, A. W. EMERY, Secretary.

Here we have an emphatic declaration from a manufacturer that the exchange instead of being helpful is an actual detriment to the manufacturer in every respect.

I now submit a letter from Mr. T. L. Wainwright, of Mississippi. He covers many phases of this question, handling it in such a manner as to exhibit his thorough understanding of what he writes about. In this letter I am supported in nearly every charge I have made against these exchanges. I will read it:

STONEWALL COTTON MILLS,
Stonewall, Miss., February 24, 1908.

Hon. A. S. BURLESON, M. C.
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Replying to your appreciated letter of the 17th instant, beg to say that I have filled in and herewith return to you my answers to your questions, but the space you have allowed me is not sufficient for a complete reply; hence as you invite a separate letter I will attempt to write you one.

I am a member of the American Cotton Manufacturers' Association, and listened with much interest to your address before that board in Philadelphia last May, and I believe you are entirely right. The so-called "bucket shops" should unquestionably be eliminated, and the nefarious, unjust, and, I must say, swindling manner in which the New York Cotton Exchange is conducted should be suppressed. They keep a stock of cotton in New York that for spinning purposes would answer the purpose no better than so many bales of hay, or picker droppings or motes, simply to tender on contract, knowing that no cotton mill could spin this stuff.

The writer has been in the cotton manufacturing business in the South for about thirty-four years, which is during his whole business career, and in all departments, and my cotton-mill friends know I am mechanically practical in manufacturing, while I have been the business head of this and several other cotton mills for many years, and the mills that I represent are known to be successful; and I have had the pleasure and honor of leading several mills to success which had been failures.

Now, touching on the future business, will say that I have frequently had occasion to buy so-called futures or future contract cotton to cover actual future sales of cotton goods, but I am very sorry to have to say that we have always come out, with very few minor exceptions, with either the hot end of the poker or short end of the string in our hands. The methods of the New York Cotton Exchange are an outrage on the public. They do not afford the protection that is expected and held out. The bucket shops are an outrage and the most pernicious gambling and swindling machines in the United States to-day. They are far worse than the Habana lottery or any of those gambling schemes. New York futures are simply second-hand warmed-over jobs that afford no protection. But the New Orleans Cotton Exchange conducts their business on a much higher plane, and do ordinarily afford protection to the manufacturer who sells his goods for forward deliveries, but they should be straightened up and restricted to an extent by proper but sane legislation.

It is argued that if our American exchanges are suppressed or closed up that we transfer the market quotations, or, I should say, prices to Liverpool. This I deny.

Several of the Southern States have recently passed laws suppressing the trading in cotton futures, or, I should say, gambling, and the cotton exchanges are putting up a howl and are claiming that this is the cause of the present low prices of cotton, and this is no doubt a fact for the present, as they have made it a point of making the farmers very sick and sore over this legislation, but, "like water, it will seek its level," and if they will knock out all this gambling I have an abiding faith that the markets will straighten themselves up in due time and the farmers will receive as good average prices for their cotton—in fact, far better—than they could possibly get with the bucket shops and cotton exchanges wide open, while not only the cotton manufacturers, but the jobbers, and through them the consumers, of cotton goods will not be subjected to such damaging and demoralizing fluctuations in prices which hurt everybody.

Now, down to the real practical facts, which will be attested by every sensible cotton-mill manager. The trouble is, we and many others have recently and heretofore many times sold large quantities of cotton goods at profitable prices and have bought the spot cotton or futures as a hedge, then the gamblers get into the deal and depress the cotton markets from one to three or four cents per pound; then down goes cotton goods, the purchasers cancel their orders and leave the cotton mills with the high price future or spot cotton on hands and their orders for the goods all canceled. We are in this fix to-day, and with a loss from this very cause on our hands that will amount to many thousands of dollars. I have gone through this experience before. The dethroned cotton kings, and many others of their stripe and class, are absolutely to blame for these terrible conditions. So, I must repeat, from a common sense and practical experience of a third of a century I am unalterably opposed to the bucket shop, and secondly to the swindling and unjust methods followed by the New York cotton exchanges, and, thirdly, to the general practice of the so-called cotton exchanges as relates to future cotton transactions. If the whole future business were swept off the map of cotton business I believe everybody would be far better off.

Your bill known as "H. R. 67" covers my views and ideas exactly. The whole trouble is that it is a gambler's scheme, and they sell many times more cotton than is produced or could possibly be delivered.

These future markets are all right if they can be handled under your bill so as to have actual deliveries made. In short, I know no better way to complete an answer to your letter than to say I heartily and fully indorse your entire bill, and I hope it will pass.

With expressions of regard, I am,

Yours, truly, T. L. WAINWRIGHT, President.

I now present a letter from an Illinois manufacturer. In it the charge is made that through the exchanges stability of price is destroyed and the producer and consumer defrauded. I read it:

AURORA COTTON MILLS,
Aurora, Ill., February 22, 1908.

Hon. A. S. BURLESON,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Referring to H. R. 67. In the twenty-four years' operation of these mills, during which time I have been connected with the active management, we have not made use of the future markets as a means of protection against unforeseen fluctuations. We are opposed to the cotton exchanges as now conducted, because they serve no legitimate purposes of commerce. The statement that they do seems plausible to the unthinking mind, but really has no foundation in fact. The producer and consumer of cotton want stability of prices, the speculators and gamblers want rapid and violent fluctuations, and use all sorts of means honorable and otherwise to produce them. The inevitable result is that the honest producer and consumer are defrauded. What influence I may have is with your bill.

Yours, truly,

AURORA COTTON MILLS,
E. S. HOBBS, Treasurer.

Mr. Chairman, I now offer for your consideration a letter from a manufacturer in my own State. It bears evidence within itself that it was penned by a thoughtful man.

DALLAS COTTON MILLS,
Dallas, Tex., February 27, 1908.

Hon. A. S. BURLESON, M. C.,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I own your favor of the 17th instant, inclosing several questions to which you ask reply, and also copy of House bill 67.

I return herewith the questions answered to the best of my ability, and will say that in my mind there is no question but what dealing in futures by the outside public is harmful to the three classes of legitimate trade in cotton, viz, farmer, shipper, and manufacturer. To all three the greatest benefit that could be derived would be to produce a stable market, and the three would prefer to get a remunerative price for cotton. It is no advantage to anyone to have low prices for farm products while it is of manifest advantage to the country at large for the farmer to reap a profit on his products.

The harm that speculators do to the market is that they increase natural fluctuations in value out of all reason. Where the market has a tendency toward higher prices the speculator runs the price beyond reason in that direction. On the contrary, when the market has a bearish tendency they reduce the price far beyond its natural swing. If it were possible to confine the trade of cotton in legitimate channels fluctuations would be far less than they have been in the past and would stick much closer to the natural value of the product.

In regard to bill No. 67, it would be a radical departure from our past experience and we can not say what the outcome would be, but trade would no doubt find some manner of getting at reasonable values and it would be reasonably uniform over the country. At present this price is made largely by the price of cotton on the Liverpool Exchange, and secondarily, by the exchanges in this country. If we could get no quotations from the exchanges in Liverpool and America, the surplus cotton shipped to Europe and England would still govern the price, and this would be ascertained by the bona fide offers made by the manufacturers in those countries for the actual cotton to be shipped to them. For the past few years the tendency in our line of business has been upward. Naturally the speculator and gambler have made their money by bulling products, and this has been of some advantage to farmers. It looks now that we are in for a period of descending prices, and it may be a few years before the tide turns. During this period of depression the speculator will naturally turn his attention to the bear side, and it is probable will run prices very much lower than they would otherwise go.

Yours, truly, J. T. HOWARD.

Here we find a declaration that the operations on these exchanges are hurtful not alone to the farmer, the cotton buyer, or shipper, but to the cotton manufacturer as well.

I also desire to bring to your attention two letters from one of the leading manufacturing firms from the State of Pennsylvania. In no uncertain terms do these letters speak in denunciation of the methods of these exchanges.

THOMAS HENRY & SONS,
Philadelphia, March 5, 1908.

Mr. A. S. BURLESON,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: As per your letter of the 17th ultimo, we beg to inclose you herewith letter filled out as requested in regard to cotton exchanges that now exist.

We think if the present cotton exchanges could be wiped out of existence the people or concerns engaged in legitimate business of cotton manufacturing would be far better off in every particular than they are at present.

Owing to the enormous rises and falls that have taken place in the cotton market quotations for the past few years it is almost impossible to do business on a legitimate basis; but if, as above stated, the exchanges were out of existence, and the old rule made to apply—that is, to make the price of cotton according to the legitimate demand and supply—it would result to the mutual advantage of the producer and the consumer, meaning the cotton-mill man as well, and the ultimate extinction of the gambling element who use the cotton market as a dummy for their gain.

If it is not possible to wipe out the exchanges, we think, in our opinion, if the following law—it would help out considerably the present condition of affairs—that is—

If dealers on the cotton exchange would be compelled to show warehouse certificates showing that, as sellers, they actually have the cotton in their possession that they wish to dispose of, and also if the buyers were compelled to put up at least 50 per cent of the actual purchase price as a margin in purchasing cotton, by this method it would cut out pretty much the "chancers," who would not know what to do with a bale of cotton if the same was in their possession.

We sincerely trust you will be able to have laws passed through both Houses to overcome the gross evils of the present cotton market, which have existed for the past ten years, and thereby receive the everlasting gratitude of the law-abiding people who have millions of dollars invested in the manufacture of cotton fabrics.

Again wishing you success, we beg to remain,

Very truly, yours,

THOMAS HENRY & SONS.

THOMAS HENRY & SONS,
Philadelphia, March 17, 1908.

Mr. A. S. BURLESON,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: We have your telegram to hand, and would ask you to kindly pardon delay in answering the same, as both members of the firm have been absent from the office for the past week, being in Boston on business.

We also have your letter of yesterday, and in reply to both letter and telegram would say we wish to put forth a few more views from our standpoint.

First. We give you permission to use our letter to your best advantage in your debate, and wish you success.

Second. Continuing our letter of March 5 would add the following:

If we are obliged to have cotton exchanges (?) for the benefit of the manufacturer and the seller, when a purchase is made on one of these exchanges the buyer should have the privilege of stating the grades of cotton that he wishes to purchase, which option he has not under the present conditions existing on the exchanges of to-day; also, the seller must be in position to deliver the grade desired.

Under the present conditions no buyer can demand any special grade of cotton at all. The seller is permitted to give any grade he desires, which, as a rule, happens to be such a grade that the spinners can not use under any conditions.

We inclose you herewith a clipping from the New York Journal of Commerce showing you the various grades of cotton and the difference there is in the cost of the same. (Of course we feel that you as a Southerner are well posted in the various grades of cotton, but inclose the above for the benefit of your fellow-Congressmen.)

As a rule the cotton exchange when called upon for delivery delivers a very low grade of cotton, which, as above stated, we (meaning the spinners) could not use in our manufacturing at any price, thus proving that the cotton exchange is good only for those who wish to buy and sell paper contracts, and is of no use to the producer and the manufacturer. If the manufacturer could buy the grade of cotton he desired and compel the seller to deliver this grade, no doubt the future cotton market would be a benefit and not a detriment to the manufacturers.

Should you take the trouble of looking over the New York Commercial, and the New York Commercial Bulletin, you will soon be convinced that the cotton exchanges are only for those who wish to buy and sell paper contracts, and the manufacturer doing legitimate business does not appear at all. In buying he merely gets 100 bales (so-called "cotton"), which upon their receipt are liable to turn out to be what in the trade we call "dog tails," and "boot legs" (slangy expressions).

We as manufacturers to-day can not use anything in grade lower than good middling in our class of manufacture, and we question seriously whether at this moment there are 700 bales of good cotton in New York market.

Our weekly consumption of cotton is on the average 100 bales of strict good middling.

In our opinion, as we believe we stated in our last letter, we feel if there is any law existing permitting trading and selling future contracts (on paper), it should be wiped out for the benefit of the country at large.

Again wishing you every success in this your undertaking to reform an evil which has existed for some time, we beg to remain,

Very respectfully, yours,

THOMAS HENRY & SONS.

Mr. Chairman, what stronger argument could be brought forward to show the great damage to the trade occasioned by the practices of these exchanges than is so clearly set forth in these letters.

I now accept the invitation of my friend, the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD], and submit the letters of Messrs. White and Bemis Brothers.

Of the scores of letters received by me from manufacturers, these two are of the very few expressing the opinion that this exchange is beneficial to trade. Let us hear what they say. I will first read the letter from Mr. White:

UNCASVILLE MANUFACTURING COMPANY,
Uncasville, Conn., February 22, 1908.

Hon. A. S. BURLESON.

DEAR SIR: I have yours of the 17th, and answer briefly the questions put forth. In expressing myself I wish to say unhesitatingly in my opinion, unless from the President down this agitation is stopped, legislating pro and con for the business interests of this country, you will put the entire country into bankruptcy within two years.

From this expression, Mr. Chairman, one would naturally class the writer as a reactionary. To continue—

The trouble is, the mass of men in Washington are impracticable men. Theoretically this scheme works out on paper satisfactorily, but practically it is a menace rather than a benefit. The people want a rest; let us go about our business and be let alone is all we ask. The great majority of the business men of the country are honest men, and they stand as ready to condemn corruption among themselves as the Government at Washington.

Mr. Chairman, this is quite emphatic, and I am rather inclined to agree with Mr. White, but pray tell me what light it throws on the subject-matter under discussion? The letter continues—

Now, in reference to trading in futures, I think there has got to be a central market for trading. When you consider the men who raise cotton are scattered over thousands of miles in isolated places not knowing the basic price of their cotton, they would be absolutely at sea in knowing the market value of their product. A uniform price must be established for certain grades, and that grade becomes a uniform value throughout the world. With this fixed standard we can form a basis for figuring the cost of goods. Supposing the future market of New York and New Orleans is eliminated. I go to buy my cotton. The man in Texas offers his cotton at 12 cents, the man in Alabama at 11¼ cents, but in Georgia it is 10 cents. There would be trading from one point to the other, resulting in an entire demoralization before the crop is disposed of.

I concur in the view here expressed that a central market for trading is desirable; but the difficulty with Mr. White is that he seems to be laboring under the delusion that trading takes place in New York in actual cotton, when in fact it is only in phantom cotton. He also seems to think that the exchange aids in making a uniform price for the different grades of cotton, when in truth it demoralizes prices and brings about frequent fluctuations rather than stability of price.

This present scheme (a central exchange) has been worked out by years of experience. Business men of the world recognize that there has got to be a basic price for all commodities such as cotton, wheat, corn, copper, iron—in fact all commodities entering into the world's commerce.

And yet, Mr. Chairman, we have no exchange dealing in contracts for the future delivery of either iron or copper. If not necessary for iron, why should it be for cotton?

I say that such a drastic bill as you propose to put through Congress, if carried through, will be an entering wedge for killing business and putting this country on the platform of socialism.

I admit that there are evils associated with the future options, but no one has a right to speculate purely for his gain or loss; this is an evil that he must put onto himself and take the consequences. Electricity has revolutionized the world. It has been of incalculable benefit to mankind, but it is a dangerous thing to handle, and be careful where you put your finger. The future markets of New York, New Orleans, and Liverpool are of immense benefit to both producer and consumer of cotton if they use it in a legitimate way, but it is a dangerous thing for anyone who has no business to touch it.

Yours, truly,

CHAS. D. WHITE.

Ah! there is the rub, Mr. Chairman. The exchange, a benefit if used in a legitimate way, but otherwise dangerous—and of course hurtful. As I have shown, in a given year not more than 12,000,000 bales are hedged legitimately, as might be claimed, while 88,000,000 bales are sold and bought as a means of gambling on the difference in prices.

Now, let us have a look at the Bemis letter. The author thereof was evidently much pleased with it, because he caused it to be published in a New York paper which frequently devotes much space to a defense of the exchange and its methods:

BEMIS BROTHERS' BAG COMPANY,
Boston, Mass., February 26, 1908.

Hon. A. S. BURLESON,
Committee on Appropriations,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Yours of February 17, addressed to Mr. J. M. Bemis, president of the Home Cotton Mills Company, St. Louis, Mo., has been sent here for reply. Mr. J. M. Bemis and I have answered the specific questions which you have asked on the form provided for the purpose and return it herewith. In addition to those replies we will say a word on the general subject of cotton futures, as you suggest or request.

In our opinion the business done in, through, and by the different cotton exchanges in this country—as, for instance, those at New York, Memphis, and New Orleans—is perfectly legitimate, and, regardless of whether such business is beneficial or detrimental to the cotton growers, the manufacturers, or the public, we feel very strongly that the Federal Government has no right and no reason to interfere. It is true that some of the operations on the cotton exchanges mentioned are gambling operations and are conducted with a spirit of gambling which is injurious in cotton futures, as it is in the case of cards or marbles. Quite different, however, from gambling with cards and marbles, gambling in cotton futures can not be properly segregated from perfectly legitimate operations. Gambling can be done in cigars or potatoes or in bread, but for that reason, in our opinion, the Federal Government should not interfere in the purchase and sale of cigars, potatoes, and bread, nor make it a crime if any individual should speculate in these articles.

Mr. Bemis here admits that the gambling is injurious, but he sees great difficulty in segregating gambling transactions from legitimate transactions. Mr. Chairman, that is exactly what is done in the proposed amendment. Read it and be convinced. Now, if when the segregation is made it should develop that the gambling transactions on this exchange preponderate to such a degree that when prevented the exchange could not survive, then that would be its misfortune and not our fault.

Mr. Bemis also seems to think that the purpose of this legislation is to interfere in some way with the purchase and sale of cotton. Not at all. Neither is it intended nor will it interfere in the slightest with legitimate speculation in cotton; but undoubtedly it would hereafter prevent the hurtful results of cotton gambling. The letter continues:

To a large extent the business done on the cotton exchanges of the country is wholly legitimate. It is true that to only a limited extent does actual cotton pass between those dealing through these exchanges, but there is no reason why it should pass between them in order to fulfill the perfectly legitimate functions which these exchanges perform. Any person selling cotton through one of the exchanges can be made to deliver it, and is supposed to deliver it if required, and any person buying cotton in one of these exchanges will get just what he buys if he wants it. There is almost no business done in the country that is done on a more definite basis regarding the quality of what is bought and sold and the requirements of fulfilling contracts than that done on these exchanges.

Mr. Bemis asserts that to a large extent the business done on the exchange is wholly legitimate. I do not agree with him. You have his assertion; I have offered you the facts. Determine for yourselves who is right. I have also shown you why the buyer of a contract rarely demands the delivery of the cotton, and as to the statement of Mr. Bemis concerning the quality of what is bought I offer the testimony of Mr. Parsons, Mr. Price, Thomas Henry & Sons, in fact all others who have spoken on this point. Considering it, one is driven to the conclusion that Mr. Bemis is mistaken. In his letter he says further:

A large portion of the business transacted on the cotton exchanges is not only perfectly legitimate, but very valuable to the commercial interests of the country, those of the cotton growers as well as those of the cotton manufacturers. To the extent that these exchanges are used legitimately, they actually lessen the amount of gambling that is necessary or would be necessary in the marketing of the cotton crop and manufacturing of the goods. For instance, a large part of the transactions on these future exchanges is made up of hedges. These hedges are made by manufacturers, cotton brokers, and cotton planters. For instance, a manufacturer will be called upon to sell a lot of goods for future delivery. He will base his price on the current cotton market, and if he makes a sale of goods he will or may cover the sales by buying either cotton futures or actual cotton for future delivery. If the latter, the broker, or it may be the farmer, in promising to sell that manufacturer cotton for future delivery at a definite price, will probably, in order to protect himself, buy futures. Now, there would be no intention on the part of any of these persons to take the actual cotton from one of these exchanges on these hedges, although he could do it if desired, and yet if it were not for the facilities thus afforded by these future exchanges, the manufacturer would not be able to hedge his sale of goods, or the broker would not be able to hedge his sale of cotton for future delivery to the manufacturer, or perhaps the planter would not be able to hedge his sale to the broker or the manufacturer. By a lack of opportunity to hedge, in order to cover the additional risk of loss by an advance in the market before the cotton should be needed, or to cover the cost of interest, storage, and insurance between the time of sale and the requirement for the cotton, it certainly would be necessary either to increase the price fixed for the cotton or the goods, or take a greater risk in making the transaction, which simply means an increase in the gambling element of it. It is a very serious question, therefore, entirely aside from the question whether the Federal Government should attempt to prevent gambling operations of the kind referred to, whether, should your bill become a law, it would not, as a matter of fact, actually increase gambling in cotton, and not only that, but force the gambling upon the legitimate handler or user of cotton instead of leaving it, as it is to-day, to be carried on by those who go into it as a matter of choice and not a matter of necessity.

Mr. Chairman, this is the same time-worn stock argument which is always put forward by the defenders of the exchange. In the first place, a large part of the transactions on the exchange are not made up of hedges, as I have shown, but are gambling transactions and nothing more. And right here I propound the query: What is it the manufacturer is seeking to hedge against? A violent fluctuation in the price of his raw material, cotton.

A careful analysis will show the truth to be that the real condition the mill man is trying to hedge against is a result brought about by the very concern—the exchange—to which he goes for hedging purposes. Abolish the exchange and the fluctuations of price created by it and there will be no necessity for anyone to hedge. Mr. Bemis further says:

In our opinion this country is suffering from too much legislation instead of too little, and, moreover, it is suffering from legislation that is based upon insufficient investigation and insufficient cause. Not only does there seem to be a desire or attempt to regulate everything, but to regulate everything without exhaustive inquiry as to the fundamental facts and as to the desirability of such regulation. Now, to be perfectly frank, we look upon your bill as falling within this category of ill-advised or unnecessary legislation. We are very glad to know that you are taking means to get the opinion of the public regarding it, which we trust will result in a conclusion to drop it, but if it does not result in that way, we can but urge a most serious consideration of the bill before it be given favorable report by the honorable Committee on Agriculture.

Yours, truly, ALBERT F. BEMIS.

Mr. Chairman, I am glad of the opportunity to use this letter. As I have said before it is one of a very few I have received attempting a defense of the exchange and its methods, and I do not hesitate to say that it is as strong and able a defense of the exchange as can be made from the manufacturer's standpoint. I will myself attempt no further answer to this letter but will content myself with bringing to your attention as an answer thereto a letter from one of the up-to-date, progressive cotton manufacturers of our country, Mr. Lewis W. Parker. This letter covers every phase of this question. The writer is thoroughly informed and treats the subject he discusses in a logical and forcible manner. The letter was written by Mr. Parker to a cotton commission house in New York City, whose members are in the exchange. This copy of his letter Mr. Parker mailed to me:

FEBRUARY 29, 1908.

H. HENTZ & CO., New York, N. Y.

GENTLEMEN: I am in receipt of your favor of the 27th instant.

As you possibly know, I am a large user of cotton in the various mills with which I am connected, using in the aggregate more than 50,000 bales of cotton a year. I therefore feel the necessity probably as much as Mr. CANNON does of an exchange whose contract will serve as a legitimate cover against the sale of my own product.

While I have the highest possible opinion of Mr. CANNON and of his judgment, I can not agree with him in the broad statement he has made in his letter to Mr. BURLESON and in his replies to Mr. BURLESON'S inquiries.

Certainly the contract of the New York Exchange this year, under conditions which should have been in its favor, has proven most unfortunate for those who used it as a cover. Very fortunately, I used it directly to a very small extent, but used it indirectly from the fact that those from whom I bought spot cotton hedged to a large extent in New York. Such parties have lost very heavily by the failure of the New York contract to assume any proper relation to the spot market. After a rather careful study of the question, I can but feel that any exchange contract that does not make futures responsive to spot conditions is at fault, and that when it becomes evident that the future contract is being kept in such shape by the exchange as to make it irresponsive to spot conditions, it becomes a great drawback to the producer and tends to upset legitimate prices for product, and should therefore be regulated by legislation.

At this time I can not undertake a further statement of my views, but I purpose at the coming meeting of the American Cotton Manufacturers' Association to discuss this at length, and I think the association would do well to memorialize Congress to pass some legislation that would restrict the use of exchanges to a legitimate business and not make them merely sources of speculation.

You are of course familiar at the present time with the absurd variance existing between the exchange markets and Southern markets. In your letter of January 18, copy of which you send me, you refer to the fact that 15,000 to 20,000 bales of low cotton in Liverpool is having a depressing effect on a stock of 940,000 bales, and, I may add, a correspondingly depressing effect on the entire unsold stock of American cotton in the hands of the producer. The same thing applies to your New York stock. The incongruity of conditions is therefore apparent when a very small portion of the crop, through the rules of the exchanges, can be permitted to regulate the price of the whole crop, and it is evident that such a condition exists only because it is in the interests of speculators, whose interests are antagonistic to those of producers and manufacturers. To-day in my own market strict middling cotton is bringing to the producer 11⅜ cents, which is practically 125 points on your contract basis; yet there is a constant effort on the part of the purchaser of cotton to force down the price of spots so as to get spots in some relation to futures. The buyer of cotton has as a rule previously hedged sales by the purchase of future contracts in the contract markets. As these future contracts are out of relation to the spot markets, and as in the hedge he necessarily now has a heavy loss, the constant effort of the buyer is to bring spots into some relation with futures by forcing declines in spots. The contract market, therefore, becomes a curse to the producer under such circumstances, as it has proven a source of great loss to the manufacturer and to the legitimate broker who has used the market as a hedge.

I had occasion no later than January to receive on the New York market 1,200 bales of cotton, and when I received the certificates tendered me and saw the character of grades and the variety of grades appearing on a certificate I was not surprised that futures sold low.

Thanking you for your full explanations and letters, I beg to remain,

Very truly,

VICTOR MANUFACTURING CO.,
LEWIS W. PARKER, President.

How completely this answers every point made by Mr. Bemis! Here we have it that the exchange actually fails to afford the protection Mr. Bemis claims to be so beneficial. Also that cotton brokers who sought the protection of this exchange sustained heavy losses because under its rules the exchange kept the price of futures from responding to spot conditions. In this letter it is clearly shown, as Mr. Parker declares, that the exchange has become a curse to the producer and the source of great loss to the manufacturer as well as the cotton broker who attempts to use it for hedging purposes.

Thus you see, Mr. Chairman, if the statements made by Mr. Parker can be accepted, the New York exchange is not a safe place for hedging purposes. And before I leave this branch of the subject I want to read another short excerpt from the Boston address of ex-President Hubbard:

In Liverpool at the present time there is an effort being made to induce them to adopt the New York method, and I beg to quote the following letter from the Manchester Guardian, written by a prominent importer of cotton—Hooper:

"Those who notice that our stock of American cotton is nearly 1,000,000 bales wonder why near 'futures' are selling at 200 points over New York and 25 points over 'new crops.' It is because we have a contract which is a boon to manipulators, but which has become a hedge for neither spinner nor merchant."

So it seems there is also doubt about the Liverpool Exchange being a safe hedging refuge, and so there is. Those manufacturers who patronize the Liverpool Exchange think the New York one is best; those who patronize the one at New York reach the conclusion that the one at New Orleans is best; but the truth is that each one is a delusion and a snare.

Now, gentlemen, in the light of this array of facts, who here will longer claim that the exchange at New York benefits the cotton manufacturer?

Second. Another stock argument brought forward in defense of the cotton exchange is that it benefits the cotton broker or merchant because the operations on the exchange afford him protection while buying for mills or the export trade, by guarding him against loss through a decline in price between the time of his purchase from the producer and his sale to the mill or to the exporter. That in thus doing it furnishes a continuous demand or broad market for the farmer's product. If the information furnished us in this letter of Mr. Parker is to be relied on, the cotton broker has been the victim of the exchange rather than its beneficiary. But, Mr. Chairman, a few days ago the distinguished gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] covered in a comprehensive way this claim of the defenders of the exchange, showing that it was a mere pretense, and I will consume no further time in its discussion.

I will say, however, that the cotton grower needs no aid from the exchanges to provide him with a market for his product. Considering the constant increase of the consumption of cotton with a growing scarcity of labor in the cotton-producing section, the real problem now is not to find a market but facilities for meeting the growing demand. Consumption of cotton is undoubtedly increasing faster than production. Never again will the producer of cotton be forced to attempt a reduction of the acreage planted to cotton, unless it be to protect himself against the manipulation of the price of his product on these exchanges.

Furthermore, Mr. Chairman, the farmer believes that cotton, if freed from manipulation by these exchanges, will command its true value in price. He believes also that for years he has been despoiled of a part of the value of his crop as a result of unrestrained speculative gambling. By overselling, this element depresses the price of cotton during the period when the farmer is marketing his crop, wresting it from his control, and then by reversing the method the price is advanced and the consumer, the spinner, is compelled to buy at a marked increase in price. It has been asserted by those well informed that it is not an infrequent thing for the mill man to pay from $25 to $30 per bale more for his cotton than was received by the man by whom it was grown. The gambling element of course enjoyed this unconscionable profit.

Mr. Chairman, the cotton grower only asks, only wants, a just, fair price for his product. He wants the price fixed by the law of supply and demand and does not want a price, however high, fixed by speculative gambling, because he knows that in the end such a price will do the millions engaged in cotton production more harm than good.

For a number of years I have been a close observer of the practices and methods of the speculative cotton gamblers in this country, and I have reached the conclusion that year after year their constant effort is to get from the farmer the bulk of the cotton crop at a lower price than it is actually worth and then force the spinner to pay for it as high a price as can be extorted from him. It is my sincere belief that it would be to the advantage of both producers and consumers of cotton if these exchanges could be put out of business.

Third. The remaining stock argument is that to abolish exchanges would in the end be hurtful to the producer of cotton. I shall attempt to show that the rules, methods, and practices of the New York Cotton Exchange are continuously hurtful to the man who grows cotton.

In the first place, it is only the low grades of cotton, such as but few spinners, especially northern and eastern spinners, who make the finer cotton goods, want or can use, which reaches New York. Now, I want to make sure of the correctness of this, because, as I shall show you later, it is the character of the actual cotton in New York tenderable on contracts for futures which regulates and fixes the price of futures, that exerts at once a reflex action on the price of cotton growing or held by the farmer. I will not ask you to take my word for this, but I support my statement by the testimony of the exchange defenders.

I read from that same letter sent by Mr. Marsh to the Atlanta paper:

> Now, as has been pointed out above, every bale of cotton that comes to New York regularly costs somebody $1.50 to cover New York expenses; evidently, then, it is never possible for any character of cotton which spinners are buying freely throughout the South to come to New York at all. The mere saying of $1.50 per bale enables the spinner always to outbid New York for such cotton as he is buying freely.

There you have it, Mr. Chairman, stronger than I stated it. According to the confession of this member of the exchange, and one of its ablest defenders, it is only the cotton not sought by the spinner that reaches New York—cotton described by Mr. Theophilus Parsons as—

> Straw, cotton seed, or even the wood of the cotton plant, all mixed together, the value of which stuff no living man is able to determine.

Permit me also to support my statement by again reading from the address delivered last May, in Philadelphia, by Mr. Price. He said on this point:

> There is no limitation in New York upon the delivery of cotton, with a staple so short that it is almost unspinnable. In fact, in my opinion, there is in the New York stock at present a considerable quantity of cotton that approaches dangerously near, so far as its staple is concerned, to what are ordinarily described as "linters." This is cotton which has remained in New York for an indefinite period. The standards of the New York Cotton Exchange should take account of these three essential characteristics. They should be simplified, so that it is not possible for any one receiving 100 bales of cotton to have to take, as he may to-day, thirty different grades in lots of one bale each.

Mr. Chairman, the stuff referred to as "linters" is not cotton at all. It is a short lint remaining on the seed after ginning, which is taken off when the oil is extracted therefrom by the cotton-seed oil mill. It is unspinnable and practically unmerchantable.

This low-grade cotton, "overs" and mixed grades, is the cotton carried in New York for the purposes of tender on the contracts made for futures on the New York Cotton Exchange. Consider for a moment, Mr. Chairman, the effect of this on the price. It undoubtedly depresses it. Permit me to quote again from the address of Mr. Price. Speaking of the New York Exchange, he said:

> They sell what they do not have in the hope that delivery of it may not be demanded, and to make sure that it will not be demanded the process of rendering the stuff that was to be delivered less and less desirable, year by year, has continued until to-day there are in New York some 20,000 or 30,000 bales of cotton which I think have been there from three to four years, and some of it longer, and which no one can be induced to buy except for the purpose of redelivering it as a means of depressing the market.

How damaging this must be, and what an outrage on the producers of cotton, for, Mr. Chairman, a depreciation of the price of futures, while not absolutely controlling, is invariably promptly reflected in the price of spot cotton—the actual cotton held and being grown by the farmer. Every man who grows cotton has had this experience and knows that at any time he offers a lot of cotton on his plantation to a buyer or broker before 9 o'clock in the morning he is met with the response—

> I can make you no offer until I hear from the market.

What market, pray? Why, the New York Cotton Exchange! Later in the day, frequently about 10 o'clock, the broker informs you that the market is off 40 points from the day before, and that he can't offer by $2 a bale what he would have given you on that day. If you doubt that the price of futures influences the price of actual cotton, all you have to do is to tabulate the price of futures and spots through a series of months. Comparing them, you can not escape the conclusion that the one follows the other.

Mr. Price says that this low-grade cotton to which I have referred is kept in New York for the purpose of depressing prices. Whether kept there for that purpose or not, it is there and has that effect. When I charged this a year ago, at the time my resolution to have this exchange investigated was before the House, it was denied. Now, not only is it shown to be true, but I have evidence that the same practice prevails at Liverpool. Who makes this fact known? None other than a member of the New York exchange. Let me call attention to this excerpt from the letter of Mr. Parker to Mr. Hentz:

> You are, of course, familiar at the present time with the absurd variance existing between the exchange markets and Southern markets. In your letter of January 18, copy of which you send me, you refer to the fact that 15,000 to 20,000 bales of low cotton in Liverpool is having a depressing effect on a stock of 940,000 bales, and, I may add, a correspondingly depressing effect on the entire unsold stock of American cotton in the hands of the producer. The same thing applies to your New York stock.

If this practice is to be condemned on the part of Liverpool, where all are interested in low-price cotton, how outrageous it becomes if practiced here. Considering that our country exported last year more than 8,000,000 bales of cotton, to depress the price 3 cents a pound means a loss to our country of $120,000,000 on this one crop. This means not loss to the farmer alone, but that America received that much less in gold when the world's balance of trade was struck. Do I exaggerate when I say these practices have not alone despoiled the hard-working cotton producer of what he was justly entitled to, but it has probably lost to our country during the last ten years not less than a half billion dollars in gold?

Remember, Mr. Chairman, this low-grade cotton in New York is not sought by the real buyers, neither did the producer take it there; it was bought and carried there.

Mr. FITZGERALD. If the buyer does not go there to buy and the seller does not go there to sell, will the gentleman explain how the operations there can possibly affect the relations between the buyers and the sellers of cotton?

Mr. BURLESON. I will answer the gentleman on that point. I hold in my hand a report made July 10, 1907, by a committee of the New York Exchange, the committee on licensing warehouses, of which Mr. James F. Maury was chairman. This committee made some very wholesome recommendations in its report, but the speculative element in the exchange promptly rejected them. I am glad the gentleman asked that question, because I want to get those statements in the RECORD. I read from this report made by members of the exchange:

> If you go to any great Southern market, as Memphis, New Orleans, Galveston, etc., you will see large lots of cotton of the various spinners' grades inspected and classed out in even-running lines of single grades ready for purchase by spinners or exporters. We used to see these in New York years ago, but we do not now—it does not pay to send them here.

I submit, Mr. Chairman, that this is a confession of my contention that even-running lots of cotton fit for spinning purposes can not be secured through the New York Exchange.

I read further from this report:

> Mr. MacColl, president of the National Association of Cotton Manufacturers, in his recent address on April 24, advises establishing a cotton exchange in New England, especially for spot cotton, to bring the planter and spinner nearer together, and to have fixed standards of grade and sworn classers. We have all these and a working system tested by years, but it is tied down to a small number of bales of mixed lots brought to New York, because they are hard to handle elsewhere.

This is a confession by members of the exchange that they have only a small amount of cotton in the exchange warehouses, and that this cotton is of mixed lots and is there only, because it can not be handled elsewhere.

Speaking, in the report, about the desirability of having in New York a stock of spinners' cotton, these members of the exchange say:

The speculative business will come here, too, because here are the largest number of buyers and sellers, and our future prices will then be based upon spinners' cotton, as they can not be said to be now.

Here, Mr. Chairman, is a confession that their prices—the future prices—are not based on spinnable cotton. If not, upon what are these prices based? Let us see. I read further from this report:

The cotton world is demanding of us that we must represent the real trading basis, the spot prices for spinners' cotton, not prices based on "overs," low grades, and speculation.

Here we have it at last, Mr. Chairman, just what the farmers and spinners have been charging for years. There is no longer doubt. There can be no further controversy over the issue. Here we have it, from the members of the New York Cotton Exchange, solemnly made in a report—a report which, as I have said, urged the adoption of a change of methods, pointing out that the whole cotton world is demanding that it represent the real trading basis, to wit, the price for spinnable cotton—a confession that their prices are based on "overs," low grades, and speculation.

What an infamous outrage—that the market price of a product engaging the best efforts of millions of our people should thus be tampered with!

Mr. Chairman, in the years to come, when our descendants look back on this period and consider that year after year we permitted the helpless producer of cotton to be thus despoiled, that we stood calmly by and witnessed the extortion practiced on the consumer of cotton by this band of gambling freebooters, they will either marvel at our stupidity or suspect that other reasons less creditable to us caused our nonaction. This report further says that—

The present price of our futures represents the value of the kind and grades of cotton which the buyer expects to get if he calls for delivery. He expects low grades and mixed lots, etc."

Yet my friend from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] wanted me to read the letter of Bemis Brothers, in which Mr. Bemis says that the buyer can get the quality of cotton bought.

Remember also, Mr. Chairman, that in addition to these conditions which operate to depress prices the seller at his option can deliver, if delivery be demanded, a score of different grades of cotton in every hundred-bale lot. This exerts a further depressing influence on the price, tending always to push futures down below spot prices, thus making the New York Cotton Exchange an advantageous market for sellers rather than for buyers.

Along in 1875–1880, when the New York Cotton Exchange was losing its uses and functions as a legitimate exchange, John Rew, an Englishman in Liverpool who speculated in spot cotton, began the practice, when he found himself short of cotton on the spot, to sell contracts for the delivery of cotton (already on the seas) "yet to arrive." This was the beginning of the future business.

When "the through bill of lading" destroyed New York as a spot market the question arose, How is the business to be kept alive? It was only a step to improve on old John Rew's plan of selling cotton "yet to arrive" and the New York Exchange promptly took the step and began to sell cotton "yet to grow," and thereafter, just as the prestige of the New York Exchange waned as a market for spots it waxed as a market for futures. Speaking of this, Mr. Price, who was practically turning State's evidence in that Philadelphia address, for he was long a member of the exchange and probably the largest dealer who ever operated on it, had this to say:

Shortly after the organization of the New York Cotton Exchange, it became apparent that the public, being optimistic and hopeful, as a rule, generally were buyers of cotton rather than sellers. The astute gentlemen, who are largely responsible for the existing rules and by-laws of the New York Cotton Exchange, recognizing this fact, as a rule, are sellers rather than buyers.

I have shown you that the character of the cotton carried in the New York Exchange warehouses makes to the advantage of the seller.

I have shown you that the fact that a number of different grades of cotton can be delivered, at the seller's option, under the New York Exchange contract, is also favorable to the seller, rather than the buyer. But, Mr. Chairman, neither of these is the most potential factor making the New York Exchange a real seller's market. The rules of the exchange are, of course, made by the members. These members, as Mr. Price says, are sellers rather than buyers—I will tell you later where buyers are found—and in making these rules they are like other human beings—no worse, it may be; no better, surely—they guard their own interests.

I now submit for your consideration a rule of this exchange which, in my opinion, operates to do the producer and consumer more damage, more serious hurt, than all other things combined. I read it from their by-laws:

SEC. 67. The committee on revision of quotations of spot cotton shall consist of seventeen members, representing the various interests of the exchange. At any meeting of this committee ten members shall constitute a quorum. If no quorum of this committee can be obtained, the president shall appoint a sufficient number of members of the exchange to form a quorum.

The duty of this committee shall be to meet twice a year, viz: on the second Wednesday of September and the third Wednesday of November, at 3.30 o'clock p. m., and receive a report from the committee on spot quotations as to the state of the market; also suggestions or opinions from any member of the exchange regarding the revision of spot quotations.

The committee shall on the day of meeting consider the report of the committee on spot quotations and the suggestions and opinions presented by members, whether in writing or verbally, and establish the differences in value of all grades, on or off, as related to middling cotton, which shall constitute the rates at which grades other than middling may be delivered upon contract.

Consider for a moment what this rule means. It is a deliberate attempt to nullify the operation of the law of supply and demand. It is an assumption of right on the part of this exchange to fix for a period of ten months the differences in value between the several grades of cotton.

There is a demand for low-grade cotton, as we know, and after differences have been fixed by this revision committee the commercial demand may materially diminish the difference in value between this cotton and cotton of the higher grades, and yet under this rule the difference fixed by this committee must stand for the full period of time. What a fruitful field for manipulation! After these differences have been fixed a storm may sweep over the entire cotton region, it frequently does, and higher grades of cotton as a result of commercial demand may advance materially over the market price of the low grades, and yet this exchange, day by day, solemnly announces that no change in differences can be made until the September to come. Regardless of how wide these differences may actually become because of the demands of the trade the New York Exchange remains a law unto itself and maintains differences fixed months before. Because of this it is a safe selling market; but all wise buyers avoid it.

The question now arises from whence comes the buyer? I'll tell you, he is the nonprofessional speculator, the small trader, the unwary multitude found here, there, and everywhere in our country—especially in the South, where we are always optimistic about cotton—who, finding the New York Exchange quotations below all others elsewhere, and not knowing the cause, and perhaps not understanding it if told, rushes in as buyer at New York, and in the end, of course, is left to hold the bag.

Yet the New York Exchange pretends to be outraged when criticism is directed against such rules and practices, and insolently demands that it remain unmolested.

Mr. Chairman, it has been charged that the revision committee has purposely established differences far out of line with the commercial difference in value between the grades. I make no such charge. Enormous injury to the producer and consumer will inevitably come as a result of honest mistakes or poor judgment on their part, and this suffices as a reason for me to condemn this arbitrary rule without venturing into the field of speculation as to the infamies and wrongs which could be perpetrated if the men who made up this committee were corrupt enough to attempt to use their power for their own selfish purposes. A careful study of the situation discloses that three factors have contributed to the abnormal depression of the price of futures on the New York Exchange below the level of spot prices in the South:

First, the character of cotton—"overs," low grades, and mixed lots—accumulated in the exchange warehouse for purposes of tender on contracts.

Second, the right of the seller to deliver mixed lots of many different grades on the contract when demand for delivery is made.

Third, the failure of the revision committee to fix differences commensurate with the real value of the several grades as shown by quotations in the South and at Liverpool.

These contribute to make the New York Exchange a seller's market. After the adoption of their plan to make the exchange a seller's market, which has continued since 1880, as the number of the sale of spots declined there was a like increase in the sale of futures. For many years the exchange published statistics showing transactions thereon. I submit this statement issued by the exchange showing the number of bales grown each year from 1880 to 1897 and the sales of futures on the New York Exchange during the same period:

Year.*	Sales for future delivery at the New York Cotton Exchange.	No. of bales of cotton produced.
1881	28,800,900	6,606,000
1882	33,077,400	5,456,000
1883	26,543,600	6,950,000
1884	24,632,100	5,713,000
1885	20,889,700	5,706,000
1886	23,270,600	6,575,000
1887	26,482,100	6,499,000
1888	25,763,900	7,047,000
1889	18,764,800	6,939,000
1800	22,138,200	7,297,000
1891	24,885,900	8,674,000
1892	34,187,200	9,018,000

1897	36,113,000	8,706,000

* Year ending August 31.

In October, 1897, the present rule for fixing differences was adopted by the exchange, which, of course, resulted in an immediate increase in the sales of futures, and since then the exchange has refused to publish the number of bales bought and sold thereon.

With these rules, are you surprised that the buyer of a contract on the New York Exchange for the future delivery of cotton, usually liquidates his contract, not by demanding delivery, but by subsequently selling a contract on the same exchange for a like amount of cotton?

Thus you see business is stimulated. Commissions are multiplied and the beneficiaries, who, of course, are the members of the exchange, "Ketch 'em gwine and cumin'." You can now understand why it takes but a small lot of cotton to answer all purposes of tender on their contracts.

Mr. Chairman, I desire to direct attention to another matter bearing on the influence exerted on the price of spot cotton by the practice of selling futures on these exchanges. At this time the cotton grower has not yet finished putting the seed in the ground for the next crop. No one can now tell the acreage to be planted and cultivated for the coming crop, for even when planting has been finished, a month from now, a sudden change of the weather, a light frost, or excessive and continuous rain in the late spring, which not infrequently occurs in the cotton region, may materially reduce this acreage. Later a protracted drought may prevail; in fact, numerous factors of uncertainty make it utterly impossible for any human agency to forecast the probable cotton crop to be grown, and yet, Mr. Chairman, these exchanges are now engaged in selling this next crop for future delivery. A glance at your morning paper will disclose that, regardless of the fact that calamities of weather may make the next crop so short that we may have a cotton famine, these gamblers are selling this next crop, October delivery, at less than 9½ cents per pound. Notwithstanding that actual cotton is now bringing about 11 cents, they are selling next year's crop at a reduction of 1½ cents on the pound. The effect of this of course is to depress the price of spot cotton when October deliveries are to be met. It arrays every person who sells a contract in antagonism to an advancement of the price, which, of course, the welfare and best interest of the poor farmer who labors to grow this crop importunately demands.

How can any honest man contend that these practices are for the cotton growers' good? How can any one be so simple-minded as to be brought to such a belief?

Mr. Chairman, for fear that some one may still doubt that operations on these exchanges control the price of the farmer's cotton, I desire to offer the testimony of two more witnesses. I take them both from the exchange—one a member of the New York Cotton Exchange, the other the president of the New Orleans Cotton Exchange. I read first from the defense of the exchange by Latham Alexander. In it he says:

If there were other exchanges throughout the United States dealing in cotton for future delivery they would have to look to the controlling market, which is New York, for quotations.

The price of cotton contracts in New York oftentimes controls the price of cotton in the whole world, because this city is presumed to know more about the supply than any other, and our operators and dealers are therefore generally followed.

Here you have a confirmation of my statement that the New Orleans concern looks to the New York Exchange for guidance and direction in the matter of prices. In other words, it trails after the big or controlling exchange. We also have the emphatic statement that the price of futures on the New York Exchange controls the price of cotton in the whole world.

Do you want further proof? If so, I submit a letter sent out by Mr. W. B. Thompson, the president of the New Orleans Exchange on the 6th day of September, 1907. I read it:

[Advances made on consignments of cotton.]

W. B. THOMPSON & COMPANY,
New Orleans, September 16, 1907.

On Saturday, Sept. 7th, October futures closed at 12.77. Middling spots were quoted at 13⅞. On Monday morning, the 9th, at 9 o'clock, the Census Report of the number of bales of new cotton ginned to Sept. 8th was published. These figures were 91,416 bales, or less than one-half the figures of Sept. 1st, 1906. The market broke some ten points. At 10 o'clock the Bureau gave out its estimate of the condition of the crop on Aug. 25th. These figures, 72.7, considering the backwardness of the crop, showed the lowest condition in many years. Immediately upon the reading of this estimate the market was smothered with offers to sell, and upon the pretext that these reports made important revelations not hitherto known and appreciated, a sensational decline was inaugurated which continued with unimportant interruption until on Saturday, the 14th inst., Octobers sold as low as 11.54, and finally closed at 11.64. Spots were quoted at 13c. nominal. Buyers and sellers apart—i. e., there were no actual sales upon which quotations could be based.

A decline of six dollars per bale within less than a week represents a serious money loss, but the fact that value could be thus annihilated without any just or reasonable cause, is a consideration of graver importance. A man may waste his property, or lose it through ignorance or mistaken judgment, and the pecuniary loss covers the injury. When one's property is taken from him by unexpected assault, he loses not only his property, but his rights. It is, therefore, of the first importance that the agency inflicting such a loss be discovered, and the remedy for the wrong be found and applied.

What momentous change transpired on the morning of the 9th to upset accepted ideas of value with which both producer and consumer were content?

The Ginners Report was not radical. It was meaningless. The fact that 191,416 bales had been ginned to Sept. 1st tells no more of the size of the crops than the number of pages in the preface to a book tells of the size of the book. The Condition Report of 72.7 on Aug. 25th, while slightly above the figure circulated by interested persons as the probable average, was lower than the ten-year average for the corresponding date, and, therefore, dangerously low. It is admitted that the crop is from three to four weeks late. Comparison should be made with other crops in the same stage of maturity; therefore the August condition of this crop should more consistently be compared with the July condition of normal crops. That this comparison is just, will be shown by the fact that after this (Aug. 25) deterioration set in corresponding to the deterioration following the July condition reports of other years. If this comparison is allowed, it will be found that the August condition this year was lower by 2.2 points than the lowest July condition in ten years and lower by 18.9 points than the July condition of 1904, in which year a crop of 13½ million bales was made on 31,730,000 acres. The condition of the crop on Sept. 14th was no better than it was on the 7th. It was worse. The outlook for a late frost and a favorable picking season was no more promising on one Saturday than on the other. The early installment of the new crop had just begun to move, and was eagerly bought at premiums; hence the weight of actual receipts was not a factor in the decline. The outlook for the cotton-goods trade was promising on the 7th. It is equally promising now. The high price of contracts was not the result of a squeeze or an upheaval of speculation. The fact that spot cotton was selling at a premium of ½ cent over September contracts proves that there was no influence at work to give contracts a fictitious value. Look as critically as we may, we can find no germane weakness that would account for the sudden collapse of the market. We must look for some outside agency. It is easily found.

The slump was the result of a premeditated attack and persistent onslaught by a party of New York operators backed by ample capital and prestige in speculation. The assault was well timed. It was not resisted; it could not be resisted. New York was the active aggressive agent in the selling. Liverpool influenced by selling orders from New York, and her own interest, as the spinners' market, offered no helping hand. New Orleans could make no effective defense because her forces had been depleted. However willing the local operators may have been and were willing to strike, as they have struck before, a blow for cotton, they knew that they could not sustain the market without the support of the great Southern public, and this support they did not have. We hold no commission to pass judgment upon the ethical question involved in the buying and selling of future contracts. Such trading may be wrong, or it may be right, according to the view-point of the individual. Nor do we undertake to pass judgment upon the wisdom or unwisdom of the radical legislation of the several States against trading in future contracts. Time will speak to better effect than argument. We are dealing with the facts that grow out of these developments. The present interesting fact is that such legislation has curtailed the buying power of the South, and, in so doing, has deprived the producer of cotton and its friends of the only force that can successfully resist unrestrained selling, and save him from such a raid as the one from which he has just suffered.

But even if under present conditions the attack could not have been resisted, is there still no way out, no remedy?

In order to break the market 113 points within less than a week in spite of the fact that every legitimate influence was against such a decline, it has been necessary to sell a tremendous lot of cotton that is not in possession nor yet bought. These short contracts are still open and the market is largely oversold. Great profits on these contracts may be figured on paper, but these profits are unrealized as yet. In order that the profits may be realized the contracts must be liquidated—that is, the seller must either buy back his contracts or be able to buy the equivalent in spot cotton on the basis of the contract prices. This means that in order for an October contract sold at 12.77 to be profitable it must be possible to liquidate it by spot cotton bought at 12c. in the interior. An October contract sold at 12c. must find cotton for sale at 11¾ in the interior or it will not be profitable. An October contract sold Saturday at 11.54 can only be liquidated profitably when cotton is selling at 10¾ in the interior. If the seller of a contract can not buy spots on this basis he can not liquidate his contract profitably by spot tender and he will be forced into the contract market to buy back his obligation to deliver the spots. When this occurs for the very reason that makes him a buyer, he will find no one willing to sell him a contract. When the shorts begin to cover they will encounter not a selling market but a buying market. That they will have to cover is inevitable, and whether they will cover at a profit or a loss will depend upon the spot holder.

The holder of spot cotton has the key to the situation. If he refuses to sell his cotton for 10¾ in the interior, then the short who has sold at 11.54 will be in difficulties and will be forced to buy back his contract. If the spot holder refuses to sell his cotton at 11¾ in the interior then the seller of a contract at 12 cents will be in trouble, and so on up the line.

Without the aid of speculation the producer has only himself to depend upon. It is a big contract but he has in his hands the means wherewith he can defend his rights and right his wrongs. He can snatch victory from defeat. He has but to refuse to accept the price by manipulation fixed for him, and the triumph of the bear will be brief, and the fruits thereof will turn to ashes in his mouth.

We do not advocate holding cotton for speculation, but we do advocate holding it for protection. If we believed that the present prices were the result of natural and legitimate causes, we would advise our friends to accept these prices and turn their cotton into money without delay. But we do not believe that the present prices are natural or legitimate. The brief experience we have had with the market this season before speculation interfered, showed that consumers were willing to pay the prevailing prices and producers were willing to accept them. If business had been permitted to run its natural course probably the increased volume of receipts would have gradually lowered prices. This would have been a natural and acceptable result. But when an outside element that knows nothing about cotton and has no interest therein except as a medium for gambling profits, arbitrarily interferes between the producer and consumer and undertakes to fix prices by sheer force of money and manipulation, we believe in suspending the rules and striking with the weapon at hand. The producer has the weapon.

W. B. THOMPSON & Co.

Mr. Chairman, it is an old adage:

When thieves fall out honest men get their dues.

I make no application of that adage here but do beg to direct attention to the fact that at that time these exchanges were at outs and in this letter the president of the New Orleans Exchange is complaining bitterly of certain action taken by members of the New York Exchange. He charged that the cotton market at that time had been smothered by offers to sell. He charged that this had resulted in depressing the price of the farmers' cotton $6 a bale. He charged that there was no just and reasonable cause for this decline in the value of cotton. He charged that this injury to the cotton producer, this loss of his property, had been brought about by unexpected action on the part of the New York Exchange. He charged that the slump in the price of the farmers' cotton was the direct result of premeditated action of the New York operators backed by money and prestige as speculators. He charged that this outside element, who knew nothing about cotton and had no interest therein except for gambling purposes, interfered between the producer and consumer, and, by the sheer force of money and manipulation, fixed the price of this great product.

Mr. Chairman, what more could we ask by way of proof of the hurtful practices of these exchanges than is here furnished. Out of their own mouths come admissions of facts upon which any intelligent, fair-minded man must condemn them. After these confessions who here will longer attempt to defend their practices?

In 1906, as I have shown, the entire receipts at New York amounted to 6,575 bales and in 1907 the receipts reached a total of 23,108 bales. For the same year (1907) the receipts at Galveston amounted to 3,891,695 bales; at New Orleans to 2,296,971 bales. At the end of that season Galveston had 30,820 bales on hand and at New Orleans there remained on hand 31,964 bales.

Now let's see what stock remained on hand at the end of the same season in New York—169,975 bales. Its receipts during the three years preceding in the aggregate were less than 65,000. Thus you see we have the proof of the truth of the charge made by Mr. Price and many others that this low-grade cotton has been accumulated and held in New York for several years for purposes of tender on contracts for futures. Mr. Chairman, the victims of all these wrongs, the farmer and spinner, are helpless to protect themselves. They can only look to us for relief. The cotton-growing States have done their full duty in an effort to suppress this evil. Every one of them save Louisiana and Oklahoma have enacted wholesome laws abolishing within their limits the gambling transactions as far as they were able to do so. These laws are having their effect and are a source of partial protection, and I assure you they have come to stay.

An attempt has been made to impress the membership of this body with the idea that already the Southern people have discovered this legislation to be a mistake. I read from one of the numerous circulars received through the mail—this particular one is believed to have been sent by a member of the New Orleans Exchange:

During the past year the writer has traveled over a very large portion of Texas and has conversed freely with many planters and business men from all parts of the State, and finds the universal sentiment among them very pronounced in favor of either a complete repeal of the present "antibucket-shop law," as it is termed out there, or an amendment thereto permitting of trading on the regular cotton exchanges and the conducting of local exchanges, as formerly. The people of Texas as a whole are the most intelligent and best educated of any State in the Union and the most liberal and the most ready to keep abreast with everything pertaining to a broad, comprehensive sphere of living, and they are now ready and anxious for a repeal of this law. At present the farmers all over the State are in absolute darkness, not having any means of knowing what the cotton market is doing, thus being at the mercy of the spot dealers, who banded themselves together in many places for the express purpose of buying cotton at ¼ to ½ cent under the market. Such a state of affairs can not long exist in a State of the magnitude and greatness of Texas. The people will not long bear it. The law was passed by a lot of sorehead politicians, who wanted to play to the galleries, but will speedily be repealed by the progressive business men and planters of the State, who desire a square deal and a chance to do business in the light rather than in darkness.

Mr. Chairman, this gentleman pays the people of my State a great compliment, and his statement would seem to indicate that he really knows the people of Texas, but I fear he does not. The people there know that as a result of legislation against cotton gambling the price of a seat in the New York Exchange has declined from $23,000 to $10,000; they know that this difference represents money now in their pockets, but which formerly went to exchange members.

Another matter about which this gentleman is mistaken is that the Texas law "was passed by a lot of sorehead politicians who wanted to play to the galleries." Mr. Chairman, I had the honor to call the meeting at the editorial rooms of the leading farmers' paper in my State—The Farm and Ranch—which took the initial step leading ultimately to the passage of the Texas law. At that conference was my honored colleague [Mr. BEALL], and I emphatically disclaim for him, as well as myself, that we are "sorehead politicians." The real purpose of this circular, however, was to impress the Congress with the idea that bucket shops are the great evil and that exchanges do good. Another circular sent out by the New Orleans Exchange also labors to fix this impression on our minds. I read from it:

Lack of a clear conception of the function of a legitimate cotton exchange and of the difference between such exchange and the bucket shop, which has no connection whatever with the legitimate cotton trade, has resulted in far-reaching confusion in the public mind, and in an effort to drive out the bucket shops the mistake has been made of enacting laws which impose harmful restrictions on the buying and selling of actual cotton for future delivery. As before said, the bucket-shop men themselves have been largely responsible for this confusion of ideas, hoping thereby to receive some measure of protection from the absence of popular discrimination when it should be shown that the legitimate future market is essential to the welfare of the cotton trade in general.

An antibucket-shop law, stringent enough and framed along practical lines, will meet the approval of every right-thinking citizen, and in the enactment and enforcement of such a law the New Orleans Cotton Exchange members, cotton merchants, bankers, cotton producers, and spinners alike can be counted on to cooperate to a common end, in the same way that all law-abiding citizens should assist in suppressing any practice or custom contrary to public good.

Antioption legislation will not suppress any bucket shop, because no bucket shop deals in contracts for actual cotton, there being no contract between the bucket shop and its customers, no intention to deliver or receive the commodity gambled on, and no commercial or trade value whatever to such transactions. No man who needs cotton or has cotton to sell ever goes to a bucket shop with that end in view, because the bucket shop does not handle cotton in any form.

Here we have again an expression of fear that the good, helpful exchange may be confused with the bad, hurtful bucket shop. In fact, that mistakes must have been made in legislation which hampers these exchanges, for surely no one would be so foolish as to restrict their operations. Then the charge is made that the wicked bucket shop is trying to muddy the waters in order to escape well-merited destruction. But, Mr. Chairman, the bucket shop might with equal consistency retaliate by saying that this vehement opposition on the part of the exchange arises from a desire to increase the commissions of exchange members by diverting the patronage of the bucket shops to the exchanges. In fact, some people have been men enough to make this charge. And, oh, how eloquent they wax in denunciation of the baneful bucket shop! Let me read from still another pamphlet sent out by the grain exchange in Chicago:

A bucket shop is a pretense; it pretends to transact business when in fact it exercises no commercial function and is devoid of every commercial feature; it is a deliberately premeditated organized fraud. It charges for a service when no service is performed; it merely weaves its web and watches for its victims. It is a gambling contrivance pure and simple. It is thoroughly demoralizing to industrial and mercantile life; it pollutes everything it touches and taints everybody with whom it is in any manner identified. It is insidiously pernicious and undermining, and is at war with every legitimate industry and every principle of mercantile life. It is a scheme for betting upon quotations under the flimsy guise of commercial transactions. A bucket shop takes one side of the bet and its customer the other side. If the customer wins, the bucket shop must lose. If the bucket shop makes money, it must follow that the customers lose money. To put it in another way, it is for the interest of the bucket shop that his customers lose money. It is for the interest of legitimate merchants that their customers make money. The profits of the bucket shop are derived from the losses of their infatuated customers. The impoverishment of their customers means the wealth of the bucket shop; and yet, strange to say, knowing this, their patrons eagerly enter the unequal contest.

Mr. Chairman, I agree with every word of this denunciation of the bucket shop, but without the slightest hesitancy I declare that as between the two I prefer the bucket shop as the less hurtful. The bucket shop injures only those who tinker with it. Its operations have no effect on market prices. Comparatively few patronize bucket shops, so but few suffer therefrom. On the other hand, the exchange manipulates prices, and millions who are innocent of any connection therewith, who have no voice in its rules, no control over its methods, are distressed, injured, and frequently despoiled of the fruits of their labor by the action of those who manage and control these exchanges. To compare the damaging results arising from bucket shop dealing, with cotton exchange practices and transactions, would be like comparing the harmless effect of two pickaninnies shooting craps for pennies in a back alley with the heart aches, bankruptcies, and suicides, resulting from the stupendous games of chance conducted at Monte Carlo.

Mr. Chairman, I thoroughly understand the many powerful influences which will be brought to bear to defeat this legislation. Not only the exchanges and boards of trade will be arrayed against its enactment, but the powerful banks which make loans to finance these innumerable transactions will bring their influence to bear on everyone whom they can reach. I know also that every newspaper harlot stands ready to throw wide its columns in defense of this so-called business. Every journalistic prostitute is eager to scribble in its defense. Already marked copies of articles in leading "Journals of Civilization" extolling these exchanges are finding us through the mails, and you need only watch, and in the local press evidences of the Scarlet Letter will be frequently manifest.

Mr. Chairman, those of us who favor this legislation were not unmindful of the herculean task confronting us when we renewed the movement to abolish the indefensible methods and practices of these exchanges. We were fully aware that the able and learned George of Mississippi and the indefatigable and persistent Hatch of Missouri had failed in a similar effort sixteen years ago; but, Mr. Chairman, we feel that we know more of the methods of these exchanges than was known at that time. We believe that the people who stand behind us are more thoroughly aroused to the great injury resulting from speculative gambling on the exchanges than they were at that time, but however this may be we are confident of the justness of the cause, and, renewing the contest, we have enlisted for the war.

We are not to be deterred by ridicule, neither shall we be misled or diverted by the plausible arguments put forward by the able defenders of this sinful traffic, but we intend to press on until the right has prevailed.

Mr. Chairman, there is another phase of this question upon which I have not touched—the moral phase. I will not say it does not appeal to me. It is known to us all that as a direct result of the gambling operations on the New York Cotton Exchange thousands of unfortunates have lost their all, beggaring their families. Numerous small merchants have been bankrupted and disgraced. Many clerks, cashiers, and officers of banks have been made defaulters and some consigned to felons' cells. But with all this we, as legislators, have nothing to do. Furthermore, I recognize that we can not legislate morals into people. I wish we could, for when one considers the terrific increase of the gambling habit throughout our country I wish something could be done to check if not prevent it. We are gambling in stocks, gambling in wheat, gambling in pork, gambling in corn, gambling in cotton, gambling in nearly everything!

Even the women are becoming addicted to the habit. Starting a few years ago with progressive euchre, with a trifling prize as the stake, I am now told that bridge-whist parties are conducted where thousands of dollars are wagered and lost. God only can foresee the effect all this will ultimately have on the character of the generation to follow. But, again, with this we have nothing to do. I favor the legislation proposed in this amendment because the evil can only be thoroughly crushed by the enactment of legislation similar to that which destroyed the Louisiana lottery. I favor this legislation because of the injurious effects of cotton gambling on the interests of the cotton producer and the cotton consumer and its demoralizing effect upon legitimate cotton trade.

Mr. Chairman, I repeat that I realize the many difficulties to be overcome before we complete this labor. Neither am I unmindful of the lesson taught in the Scriptural text, I believe to be found in Luke:

For which of you, intending to build a tower, sitteth not down first and counteth the cost, whether he have sufficient to finish it? Lest haply, after he hath laid the foundation and is not able to finish it, all that behold it begin to mock him, saying, "This man began to build and was not able to finish."

We have counted the cost and confidently believe we have sufficient to complete the tower. We have begun the work, and so long as I remain a member of this body it shall continue. Time alone can tell whether we will finish, but I offer this suggestion to the exchange and its defenders: Begin not yet to mock, but rather keep in mind the adage:

He laughs best who laughs last.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

The Clerk concluded the reading of the bill.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the Clerk be permitted to correct the totals.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks on the road question in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Chairman, under the permission granted me, I desire to insert in the RECORD, as bearing upon the paragraph just read, a letter from an agent of the Agricultural Department, who has been at work in Tennessee and in the district I have the honor to represent in this House. This letter sets out the work and the conditions in this section in the endeavor to eradicate cattle ticks as it appears to him. Also he has furnished me with resolutions adopted by the Interstate Association of Live Stock Sanitary Boards and by the Southern States Association of Commissioners of Agriculture, which I insert in the RECORD. Also a letter from Prof. H. A. Morgan, director of the agricultural experiment station at the University of Tennessee:

UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
BUREAU OF ANIMAL INDUSTRY,
Nashville, Tenn., December 13, 1907.

Hon. W. C. HOUSTON.

MY DEAR SIR: I make no apology in troubling you with this letter. The purpose of the letter must be its only excuse. For the past year I have had charge of all legal matters pertaining to the Bureau of Animal Industry in Tennessee, Alabama, and Georgia, and I know what I am now writing about. We have this season been hard at work with the most cordial cooperation of the State authorities in a war on cattle ticks and Texas fever.

Thirty-one of the Tennessee counties we found very badly tick infected. But Dr. W. P. Ellenberger, the inspector in charge, has had about sixty skilled employees of the Bureau at work in inspecting thousands of farms, who have inspected many thousands of cattle, and have seen to it that they were disinfected. Meantime, information has been disseminated by public meetings, by publications, full and explicit, in both the metropolitan and county newspapers, and by the distribution of thousands of pamphlets from the Bureau on the subject of cattle fever, until public opinion has been informed and aroused so that in the counties of Rhea, McMinn, Bledsoe, Dekalb, Coffee, Cannon, White, Moore, Jackson, Clay, Fentress, Carroll, and Fayette the ticks have been almost, if not entirely, stamped out, and these counties will soon go above the quarantine line, though still held under supervision.

In many other counties, like Lincoln, Franklin, Putnam, and Overton, a great work has been done, which will be followed up; but in ten counties, for utter lack of funds, no real work has yet been done. Yet the people are now ready for cooperative work.

The annual loss and cost to Tennessee from Texas fever is now yearly the great sum of $4,000,000, and to all the infected States it is not less than $60,000,000. And this is an annual dead loss. Now, with sixty expert men as inspectors we have expended, without the waste of a penny, about $40,000 during the season now closing; but we now feel that we should, and if the means are furnished we know we can, utterly abolish and stamp out the ticks in every county this coming season. Yet we have just learned that the estimate for the work of tick eradication for the coming year is just what Congress granted last year, viz, $150,000, and this for all the States. Now, this is most niggard and wasteful economy. Only $40,000 to save each year in Tennessee the sum of $4,000,000! One dollar to save $100 each year! To rid Tennessee this coming year of ticks we need fully $80,000. Because of lack of funds Doctor Ellenberger has been forced to discharge almost all the men who, though not then experts, have become such, who were native to the manor, and the expert employees of the Bureau who were sent here have nearly all been sent away to other fields.

But what is to be done? Official etiquette forbids me to write, for obvious reasons, to the Secretary, Mr. Wilson, besides Congress is the boss. But I write freely to you because, while you are a Member of Congress, yet I know you to be both ardent and active to aid your constituents and all the people of Tennessee. You will think, act, argue, and vote as to you shall seem good. Yet I am a Tennessean, too, and write from this end of the line. But why not leave this local matter of fever-tick eradication to the local State authorities? Well, to begin with, it is not a local question. Texas fever is a contagion and beef cattle are sold in all markets and the subject affects all who eat beef. Besides the States, and much less the separate coun-tics, do not have the skill, the science, the experience, the "know how" which the Bureau of Animal Industry has in large measure; which it has reached and attained to at the nation's expense; and the Bureau is doing work, paid for by the General Government, in a score of ways in every State in the Union. Tennessee is pivotal and a border State as to tick territory. Clean up Tennessee fully and a demonstration will be had that it can be eradicated in every State.

You can make such use as you choose of this letter, or put it in the waste basket. I have had my "say."

With sentiments of high esteem,

I am, yours, very truly, A. H. PETTIBONE.
Agent, etc., United States Department of Agriculture.

Resolution adopted by the Interstate Association of Live Stock Sanitary Boards at its annual meeting in Richmond, Va., September 17, 1907:

Whereas the great losses to Southern cattle owners resulting from the presence of the fever tick (Boophilus annulatus) are now a well established and generally accepted fact; and

Whereas the work already done has demonstrated the feasibility of the eradication of the fever tick, and the progress made with the funds recently appropriated by Congress has been very satisfactory; and

Whereas the known facts regarding the life history of the tick and methods for its destruction justify the prosecution of the work on a more comprehensive and extensive scale: Therefore be it

Resolved by the Live Stock Sanitary Boards of the United States in convention assembled, That the appropriation made for this work by the United States Congress for the next fiscal year should be increased to an amount commensurate with the magnitude and importance of the work to be done, which, in our opinion, should not be less than $500,000, and we respectfully urge the United States Secretary of Agriculture and the Congressmen of our respective States to use their best efforts to obtain such Congressional appropriation.

TAIT BUTLER,
Secretary of Committee.

Resolutions passed by the Southern States Association of Commissioners of Agriculture and Other Agricultural Workers at its annual meeting at Columbia, S. C., November 20, 1907:

Whereas satisfactory and sufficient reasons have been firmly established that the cattle tick should be eradicated from all infested regions of the United States; and

Whereas during the past two years the Bureau of Animal Industry and the various States interested have cleaned about 85,000 square miles and have also partially cleaned about 30,000 square miles of infested territory; and

Whereas this work has been done with insufficient funds, which has necessitated the removal of inspectors at times when the work was severely crippled or retarded thereby; and

Whereas the success of the cattle industry in the South is wholly dependent upon the extermination of the cattle tick: Therefore be it

Resolved, That this association request Congress to appropriate $500,000, to be used exclusively in cattle-tick eradication, and that we urge our Congressmen, cattle men, commissioners of agriculture, State veterinarians, and all others interested to use every honorable means in securing this appropriation.

UNIVERSITY OF TENNESSEE, AGRICULTURAL EXPERIMENT STATION,
Knoxville, January 21, 1908.

Hon. WM. C. HOUSTON,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: Congressman RANSDELL, of Louisiana, has just called my attention to the fact that there is some question regarding the appropriation for tick eradication in this and other Southern States. Tennessee has been peculiarly fortunate in getting a great deal of service from previous appropriations, and through these has had many counties placed above the national quarantine line. The presence of the cattle tick within the State has had a baneful effect upon our animal husbandry, and indirectly upon our soil fertility, and therefore we regard this as one of the most important agricultural matters that affect us.

I sincerely trust that you will be able to help in increasing the appropriation for this work, as the suspension of activity in tick eradication now would certainly mean its spread into counties of our State now uninfested.

Wishing you the compliments of the season and with kindest regards, I beg to remain,

Very sincerely, yours, H. A. MORGAN, Director.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I move the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose, and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. FOSTER of Vermont, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 19158—the agricultural appropriation bill—and had directed him to report the same back to the House with sundry amendments, with recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Speaker, at the proper time I shall ask for a separate vote upon the amendment by which the figures at the end of the general-expense paragraph, Bureau of Soils, were changed from $170,000 to $333,460. I shall ask this because I believe that amendment was adopted on account of a misapprehension on the part of a majority of the Members then present. I think many votes were cast for that amendment under the impression that the sum carried in the bill for the Bureau of Soils was insufficient to permit that Bureau to carry forward the work in which it is now engaged.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. SCOTT. I must decline to yield.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I want to ask a question as to procedure. Does the gentleman propose to discuss the question now?

Mr. SCOTT. If the gentleman will possess his soul in patience, he will discover what I propose to do.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I wanted to ask the gentleman, if he proposes to discuss the question, if he intends to yield as much time to this side as he consumes?

Mr. SCOTT. I certainly expect to do that.

Mr. Speaker, in order that there may be a clear understanding, I wish to give the House the history of this item. The estimates as they came from the Secretary of Agriculture called for $200,000 for this item. When the Chief of the Bureau of Soils was brought before the committee and asked to what purpose he expected to devote this additional sum he replied substantially that a greater part of it would be used in soil utilization work. He also asked for new language to be introduced in the bill to permit him to do that work, as follows:

To investigate and demonstrate the best methods for the utilization of the soil resources of the United States and the best methods of soil management for the different localities and different types of soil; to investigate and demonstrate the principles of soil fertility and the fertilizer and manurial requirements of soils.

When the Secretary came before the committee we called his attention to this new language and asked him if it did not provide for substantially the kind of work that is now being done under the Bureau of Plant Industry in the farm management division. He admitted at once that it did, because the language was almost identical, and it was with his full consent and approval that the proposed increase was disallowed, because it was the opinion of the Secretary, as it was of the committee, and as I believe it must be of this House, that there ought not to be a duplication of the work of those two Bureaus in the same Department. Having arranged with the Secretary that there should be no duplication of this work, the committee had an understanding with him also that the utilization part of it, for continuing which the principal portion of the increase in the Bureau of Soils was demanded, should be carried forward, and I have the authority of the Secretary of Agriculture to say now that arrangements have already been perfected to do this work so that the legitimate field of the Bureau of Soils will not be curtailed.

On the contrary that Bureau will be permitted to carry on a great deal more work in that field than it has been doing during the past year. We discovered that even although the authority had not been given the Chief, he had been doing, and is doing, utilization work this year, for which he will spend $38,000. That additional amount will be available for his use for the proper purpose of soil surveys during the coming year, and with it he can put seven more parties in the field than he now has, so that not only can the Bureau do all that it has been doing in the way of soil surveys, but it will be able to send out seven more parties, making twenty-five or thirty additional surveys.

But there is another reason, gentlemen of this House, why I think this amendment ought not to remain in the bill, a reason which I approach with a great deal of reluctance because it involves a rather severe criticism of the conduct of this Bureau, a reason which I would not state except under the compulsion of a profound sense of responsibility as a Member of this House. In the course of the examination of the Chief of the Bureau of Soils he was asked whether he would have men enough to carry forward this work for which he was asking so great an additional appropriation. He said:

We have enough trained men now in the Bureau to take charge of forty soil-survey parties.

The question was asked him,

What are those men doing now? Is the work they are now engaged upon necessary?

He said:

It is work we have no need of now. It is preparing for work years hence.

Then the question was asked him why he had not discharged some of these men, thereby obtaining funds for increasing the number of the soil surveys for which he declared there was so great a demand, and he said:

Of course if the Congress is going to limit the amount of work done to $80,000, that is what I should do, get rid of some of them, discharge them or send them out to other lines, but I have husbanded the force and held them back and educated them and gradually increased their salaries in the hope that eventually Congress would be willing to extend the soil-survey work.

The suggestion was made to him that Congress ought to be the best judge of its appropriations, and that when the appropriation was made it was the duty of an administrative officer to use it and make the best use of it he could and not to anticipate a greater appropriation in the future. The reply to that was:

It has been a matter of administrative discretion, and we have taken this course and are putting it up to Congress now as to what we shall do in the future.

I want to put it up to Congress now whether this House is willing to encourage a bureau chief in going outside the limits laid down by the law which this body enacts? I said a moment ago that we found this Bureau Chief had already been doing this work for which there was no authority in the law. I asked him where he got his authority, and he cited these words:

The investigation of the relations of soils to climate and organic life.

Is there any human being who will interpret those words as warranting a bureau in sending out scores of utilization parties to plant crops and tend them and gather them? I asked him, if that language was sufficient to warrant his expenditure, why he came in and asked for the new language which I read a moment ago. There was no answer to that question, because there could not be any answer given to it. I put it up to this House whether they want to send word to the subordinates in the various Departments that they need pay no attention to the laws that are passed by this body, that they can go ahead and spend money regardless of the limitations put upon that expenditure by Congress. I want to put it up to this House whether they wish to serve notice on the subordinates in the various Departments that they can go over the head of their Department chief, that they can go over the head of a committee of Congress, and with all the arts and artifices of expert lobbying and logrolling force an appropriation through this body. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, I reserve the remainder of my time, and will yield as much as I have used to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HUMPHREYS].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has used ten minutes.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, I will ask the Speaker to notify me when I have consumed five minutes of time.

Mr. Speaker, before I proceed I want to submit this statement: I yield to no man in my admiration, my deference, and my consideration for the Committee on Agriculture. But I believe that that great committee is, like all other committees of this House, subject to error. I want to say further that the amendment which I offered was not the result of any logrolling with me by the Chief of the Bureau of Soils or by any representative from the Bureau of Soils. I never saw the Chief of the Bureau of Soils in my life, and I never had a communication from him on this subject. I have had no request, directly or indirectly, from the Chief of the Bureau or any person connected with the Bureau to introduce this amendment, and nobody connected in an official way with the Bureau knew that I intended to offer the amendment. I say that in reply to the suggestion of the chairman that the favor the amendment has in this House is the result of expert logrolling. I was inspired to offer this amendment by the study that I had given this subject.

I had observed that the soils of this country are producing less per acre than the soils of the countries of the Old World. I had observed that in England, where they began exactly this work of soil surveying nearly one hundred years ago, making exactly the same investigations that we make, and following it with the utilization work as we propose to follow it here, the yield per acre had advanced as the yield in America had decreased, until last year we produced in this country upon our new lands 15½ bushels of wheat per acre, whereas in England, as a result of this method and of other experiments of soil reclamation and adaptation, their acres yielded 33 bushels per acre. I was inspired by that to offer the amendment.

The Secretary of Agriculture in his annual report in commending, as he does commend in most emphatic and unequivocal terms, the work and the purposes of this Bureau, says that $100,000,000 annually is spent in the United States for fertilizers, and that at least one-third of it is wasted because of the misapplication of fertilizer elements to soil conditions. He believes and I believe that a proper scientific and intelligent study of the soils, such an analysis, both physical and chemical, as will bring a knowledge of the constituent elements of the soils, showing its needs, discovering those toxic and excretal elements that render the soil unproductive, will enable the farmers to buy their fertilizers with intelligent discrimination, and so save to them the tremendous sum of $33,000,000 annually. And this inspired me to offer the amendment.

The Secretary of Agriculture has told us in his report that the demand for these soil-survey maps is increasing yearly, and that these requests are from every part of this country. There are more than 400 applications now on file in the Department asking for these surveys, and if the amendment is stricken from the bill only fifty-nine of these applications can be granted. This means that it will require fifty years to do the work which the Secretary says when done will save the farmers in the purchase of the single item of fertilizer alone $33,000,000 a year. And this inspired me to offer the amendment.

The chairman of the committee tells us that the utilization work which is intended and needed to demonstrate to the farmers in a practical way the several varieties of plant life which are best adapted to the soil, as discovered by the survey, will be done by the Bureau of Plant Industry. This is not the best way, in my opinion, Mr. Speaker, to secure results. I believe the bureau that makes the survey of the soil and propounds the theory of its adaptation to some particular plant life—as, for instance, that the elements in the soil indicate a particular variety of tobacco, as was actually the case in the Texas experiment—is the bureau which will most earnestly devote its energies to the demonstration of that theory.

These are some of the reasons, Mr. Speaker, that inspired my amendment, and they were sufficient without any suggestion from the Chief of the Bureau of Soils.

Now, Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, understand this, that the proposition of the Committee on Agriculture is to reduce the appropriation for the utilization work. Thirty-eight thousand dollars was used last year by this Bureau in this utilization work. At the same time the Bureau of Plant Industry was engaged in a similar work. The Bureau of Plant Industry will continue their work, but the $38,000 last year devoted to this purpose by the Bureau of Soils will not be used if the amendment is voted down, but will be used to further prosecute the soil-survey work, which, according to the opinion of the chairman and according to the opinion of the committee, is practically useless unless followed up by the demonstration work.

Just a minute more. The Bureau Chief has husbanded his force—as he says, has corralled a number of experts whom he has educated to this work—and if the appropriation is reduced according to the proposition of the Committee on Agriculture, that expert force will be dissipated; they will be discharged, and less of this work will be done by $38,000 than was done last year. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, I yield the balance of time to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has four minutes left.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I am very much surprised at the argument made by the gentleman from Kansas in presenting this question to the House. Here is a grave public question, involving the interests of far more than a majority of the people of the United States; a question that goes into their homes and abides by their firesides; a question of prosperity and success to the farming interests of the United States; and after the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union has seen fit, after proper discussion, to increase this appropriation for the benefit of the farming classes of this country, the chairman of this great committee comes before this House and rests his argument against this appropriation by an attack on an individual. He calls on this House to vote down this appropriation because he says the chief of the Bureau in charge of this work has been overzealous in his authority and gone beyond the power that Congress has given him.

Now, is that any argument why we should not carry out this work if it is a success and if it is a worthy work? I think that such an argument requires no answer.

Mr. Speaker, there is a foundation to scientific agriculture, and that foundation is soil survey. You can not have scientific agriculture without you know what is in the soil. But, Mr. Speaker, you might as well not have soil survey if you do not bring a practical demonstration of what the soil means to the door of the farmer's home. He is not a scientist. He can not take your report and study it out from a scientific standpoint. You must bring a practical man to his field and to his farm and demonstrate what this scientific work means.

Now, the gentleman in charge of this bill says that the Bureau of Plant Industry does this work. Not at all. The Bureau of Plant Industry is carrying on scientific work; but, so far as I have been able to judge from what I have read of their work and what I have actually seen of their work, they are not demonstrating the use of soils. They are experimenting with the growing and development of plants and farm management. What you want to carry to the farmer is the knowledge of what each soil is useful for, how he can make most money out of it, and it is an absolute part, a logical part, of the work of the Bureau of Soils, to carry on the work, after making the soil survey, to demonstrate and carry into the home of the farmer a practical knowledge of how to use and utilize the soils of his farm. Now, that is what the Bureau Chief has been doing, and that is what this appropriation is intended to do.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and all amendments thereto to final passage.

The question was taken, and the previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded?

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Speaker, I demand a separate vote on the amendment changing the appropriation in the paragraph for general expenses of the Bureau of Soils; and if my motion prevails I shall ask, of course, that the total be changed to correspond.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks for a separate vote on the two amendments.

Mr. GRIGGS. On that I call for the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any other of the amendments? If not, the vote will be taken on the other amendments in gross.

No other separate vote was demanded.

The question was taken, and the remaining amendments were agreed to in gross.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will now report the two amendments.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 22, page 29, strike out all after the word "expenses" and insert "$333,460;" and in lines 24 and 25 change the total to read "$368,160."

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the vote will be taken upon the two amendments together.

There was no objection.

Mr. GRIGGS. I call for the yeas and nays on the amendments.

The question was taken, and the yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken, and there were—yeas 142, nays 128, answered "present" 17, not voting 102, as follows:

On motion of Mr. SCOTT, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Mississippi rise?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I rose for the purpose of calling the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill, but it is too late now.

The SPEAKER. The Chair failed to recognize the voice of the gentleman or catch his eye.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I hope the Speaker will not have that difficulty in the future.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi is strong of voice and the Chair is keen of hearing. [Laughter.]

Mr. WILLIAMS. The gentleman from Mississippi exercised his voice to the best of his ability, but the Chair must have been delinquent in the exercise of his auditory nerves. [Laughter.]

TUBERCULOSIS IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The SPEAKER. That makes forty-five; not a sufficient number.

Mr. STANLEY. I do not think the Chair counted me. I was very far over on this side.

The SPEAKER. Was the gentleman standing?

Mr. STANLEY. Yes.

The SPEAKER. Then the Chair caught him. [Laughter.]

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I demand the other side.

The other side was taken.

The SPEAKER. Evidently a sufficient number, and the yeas and nays are ordered.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering the bill (H. R. 20063) making appropriations for the District of Columbia for the ensuing fiscal year, and, pending that motion, I ask unanimous consent that eight hours be allowed for general debate, half of the time to be controlled by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BURLESON], the ranking Member of the minority, and the other half by myself.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I rise for the purpose of moving to reconsider the vote just passed, and to lay that motion on the table.

Mr. PAYNE. I make the point of order that the motion is dilatory.

The SPEAKER. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the President's message, with Mr. LAWRENCE in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolution 233.

Resolved, That so much of the special message of the President of the United States communicated to the two Houses of Congress on January 31, 1908, as relates to the revenue and the bonded debt of the United States be referred to the Committee on Ways and Means.

That so much as relates to the judiciary of the United States, to the administration of justice, to the punishment and prevention of crime, to judicial proceedings, civil and criminal, and to the organization of courts be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

That so much as relates to commerce and the Isthmian Canal be referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

That so much as relates to the post-office and post-roads be referred to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

That so much as relates to the public domain be referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

That so much as relates to labor be referred to the Committee on Labor.

That so much as relates to private and domestic claims and demands, other than war claims, against the United States be referred to the Committee on Claims.

That so much as relates to reform in the civil service be referred to the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service.

That so much as relates to the election of the President, Vice-President, or Representatives in Congress be referred to the Committee on Election of President, Vice-President, and Representatives in Congress.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I wish to ask the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] a question.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York yield to the gentleman from Mississippi?

Mr. WILLIAMS. What portion of the message was referred to the Committee on Ways and Means?

Mr. PAYNE. So much as relates to revenue.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. PAYNE. I decline to yield further.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Will the gentleman let me interrogate him?

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, it is very singular after the performance we have just gone through that two or three gentlemen, before I have spoken a word, rise to ask a question. Of course it is well understood by the House why it is done.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I thought the gentleman was going to move the previous question or something else.

Mr. PAYNE. Now, Mr. Chairman, this is a simple resolution to distribute this message of the President, distributing the various topics to the committees having jurisdiction under the rules of these topics. The resolution was promptly introduced after the message reached here a month ago or more, and was promptly reported by the Committee on Ways and Means. I was then asked if there would be time for debate given, and I said there would be, and I expected to give it. I do not expect to give it now, and I want the other side to take notice of that. I do not expect to give it because of the hypocrisy which has been exhibited on the other side of the aisle. The other day when the matter came up I was challenged by two or three gentlemen on the other side and asked why I did not bring this message before the House and have it considered and these topics referred to the various committees. I offered to do it then. I asked unanimous consent to do it then, and the very gentleman who had challenged me made the objection in the House that it should not be considered at that time by unanimous consent of the House as in the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] yield to his colleague [Mr. FITZGERALD]?

Mr. PAYNE. I do not. I yield to no one.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. PAYNE. I am here for business, Mr. Chairman, and if this side of the House will stay here, we will put this resolution through to-night without amendment and without a single speech on the other side of the House. [Applause on the Republican side.] The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] commenced a week or two ago with the announcement that he would indulge in the peurile practice of filibuster in this House unless a majority should take the programme that he laid down and carry it out. He forgot that this side of the House is in charge of the business of the House, and the business of the House will go through just as the majority on this side decide it shall go through. Why, Mr. Chairman, we will take up the topics of the President's message in their order in the House. The Supreme Court decided that the employers' liability act which we passed in the last Congress was unconstitutional, and there never has been a moment of time when there was any doubt on the part of any intelligent Member of this House but that we would put through an employers' liability act that would be constitutional and take the place of the other. [Applause on the Republican side.]

We will take up the other topics in our own time and in our own way, and when the bills are passed they will reflect the sentiment of the majority of this House, whether the other side want to join in the procession or strive to defeat the majority in the House. Now, I do not want any gentleman on the other side of the House to come to me and ask me to grant unanimous consent or not to object when they want to print something in the RECORD.

Go to your leader, the gentleman from Mississippi, and ask him to stop his filibustering; ask him to stop his objections, and when he stops his objections and stops filibustering, then the business of the House will proceed in the usual way; otherwise we will put the business through in our way in spite of your objections. [Loud applause on the Republican side.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, I propose to make a motion that the committee rise, and when the committee goes back into the House I propose to make a motion that all general debate on this resolution now close. I move that the committee do now rise.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. WILLIAMS. To make a parliamentry inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Is it not in order to offer an amendment to the resolution offered by the gentleman from New York?

The CHAIRMAN. General debate has not been closed. The motion is that the committee rise, and that motion is not debatable.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Then the only way to get an amendment is to vote down the motion that the committee rise.

The CHAIRMAN. That is correct.

Mr. DALZELL. Which you can not do. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

The question was taken on the motion that the committee rise, and the Chairman announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I demand tellers.

The question was taken, and tellers were ordered.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] and the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] will take their places as tellers.

The committee again divided, and the tellers reported—ayes 112, noes 69.

So the committee determined to rise.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. LAWRENCE, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration House resolution 233 and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I move that all general debate on the resolution be now closed, and on that I demand the previous question.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. PAYNE. I make the point that that motion is dilatory.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York demands the previous question.

Mr. FITZGERALD. A parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I was going to suggest to the Chair that a motion to adjourn is one of high privilege.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman insists upon the motion to adjourn, it has preference.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I suggest to the gentleman that perhaps we can agree on a reasonable time for discussion.

Mr. PAYNE. The time is now, I want to suggest to my colleague. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

The question was taken upon ordering the previous question.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Division, Mr. Speaker.

The House divided, and there were—ayes 140, noes 60.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I demand tellers.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken, and there were—yeas 121, nays 94, answered "present" 16, not voting 157, as follows:

The Clerk announced the following additional pairs:

For the balance of the day:

Mr. SLEMP with Mr. SULZER.

Mr. LILLEY with Mr. PATTERSON.

Mr. SCOTT with Mr. CRAVENS.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

So the motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of resolution No. 233, to dispose of the President's special message of January 31, 1908, with Mr. LAWRENCE in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the resolution to dispose of the President's message. General debate having been closed by order of the House, the Clerk will read the resolution under the five-minute rule.

The Clerk proceeded with the reading of the resolution.

Mr. WILLIAMS (interrupting the reading). Mr. Chairman, at the end of the reading of the first clause I attempted to get the attention of the Chair to offer an amendment.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the resolution must first be read in its entirety.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, the resolution has been read under the first reading and the Clerk is now reading it under the instructions of the Chair under the five-minute rule, as the notes of the stenographer will show the Chair to have announced.

Mr. PAYNE. What difference does it make? The resolution must first be read, and then it is open to amendment.

Mr. WILLIAMS. It is now being read under the five-minute rule for amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Amendments will be in order when the reading of the resolution has been completed, as the Chair understands.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, as I understand the rules of the House, after the reading of each paragraph a motion to amend that paragraph is in order. Now, I waited until the Clerk read the first paragraph, that paragraph which refers certain matters to the Committee on Ways and Means. I then arose and addressed the Chair in the usual and respectful way, and I have now the attention of the Chair, and I offer the following amendment to paragraph 1.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, to that I raise the point of order.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Mississippi has a right to have his amendment read. How can the gentleman from New York raise his point of order until it has been read.

Mr. PAYNE. I raise the point of order that the resolution must first be read in its entirety, and it will be open to amendment under the five-minute rule. This is not a bill under the rules, but merely a resolution—a single resolution—which must be first read.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, I wish to be heard on the point of order. This resolution contains several resolutions, each separate and independent of the others. The gentleman makes the point of order that the resolution must first be read, and then the amendments can be offered, when read, under the five-minute rule.

Now, I state as a matter of fact, as I understand the situation, that the resolution was read in the Committee of the Whole House before that committee rose back here, about an hour ago, and upon taking his seat a moment ago the present occupant of the chair announced that "all general debate having been closed, the Clerk will now read the resolution under the five-minute rule," and under that announcement of the Chair I have offered this amendment, so that the gentleman from New York simply does not understand the state of the facts before the committee, or else the Chair himself has not properly stated the status of the legislation. If the Chair has properly stated it, then my motion is now in order, and I take it the Chair has properly stated it, because the Chair's statement is in accordance with my own recollection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands the rule under which matters are considered under the five-minute rule is this, that all revenue bills and appropriation bills are considered by paragraphs; all other bills by sections. It is very rare that the House goes into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union to consider a resolution like this, the House usually considering it by unanimous consent. About two years ago, however, a similar resolution was considered in Committee of the Whole, and the Chair understands that at that time it was considered as a resolution in its entirety—as one section. The Chair will rule that this resolution should be considered in its entirety, and at the conclusion of the reading of the resolution there will be opportunity for offering amendments under the five-minute rule to any part of the resolution.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Do I understand the ruling of the Chair to be that my amendment is pending?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's amendment will be in order and the gentleman will be recognized to offer it as soon as the reading is concluded.

Mr. PAYNE. If he gets recognition it will be in order.

The resolution was read.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. WILLIAMS. I now offer my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, being in charge of the resolution I submit that under parliamentary practice I am entitled to recognition.

The CHAIRMAN. If the gentleman has an amendment he is entitled to prior recognition. [Applause on the Democratic side.] The Chair will state if the gentleman from New York has an amendment to offer——

Mr. PAYNE. I propose to move to strike out the last word.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, I submit it is too late for that now. It is too late to make that motion now. If the gentleman had been upon his feet at the same time I was offering an amendment and striving himself to offer one undoubtedly he would have been entitled to preference. But he was not upon his feet to offer any amendment and his amendment is, and I leave it to him if it is not, an afterthought. It was never his intention at the time that I offered this amendment to offer one. If he had been upon his feet then trying to offer one, his present position would have been correct, but I insist that the Chair—I may say that I know without insisting—the Chair is going to do equal and exact justice in this House.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Mississippi is wrong now, as he is usually wrong——

Mr. WILLIAMS. The gentleman mistakes rudeness for wit.

Mr. PAYNE. The gentleman got up here clamoring for recognition out of order in order to offer an amendment when the first paragraph was read.

As soon as the reading of the resolution was completed I rose and was on my feet when the last word was completed and addressed the Chair. At the same time the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] was addressing the Chair. Being in charge of the resolution I knew that, according to the usages of the House, I had a right to be heard first for an amendment. I offered an amendment as soon as I was recognized by the Chair. I intended to do this, Mr. Chairman; I intended to do this more than an hour ago, for I proposed, after I offered the amendment, to make a motion.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, I have but to appeal in furo conscientiæ to the Chair himself. The Chair stated to me that I would be in order when the reading of the entire resolution was through, differing in opinion with me because I thought I was in order when the paragraph was finished, and the Chair said I would then be recognized for the purpose. I rose at the particular time indicated by the Chair, was recognized by the Chair, and that is all there is to it. It is a "plain tale which will put him down."

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair stated that the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] could offer an amendment to the bill when the reading was completed, and he would be recognized for that purpose, and he will be; but the Chair did not state that he would give him precedence in recognition.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I rise to a question of order. My point of order is that the Chair having recognized the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS], the gentleman from Mississippi is entitled to proceed.

The CHAIRMAN. The right of recognition must rest with the Chair.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The Chair has recognized the gentleman, however, and exercised that discretion.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair, under the procedure of the House, must recognize the gentleman in charge of the bill if he rises for the purpose of offering an amendment. The Chair can not question his motives. The gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] has offered an amendment to strike out the last word, and he is entitled to the floor. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. PAYNE. I want in the first place to set the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] right.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] is not debating the amendment.

Mr. PAYNE. I want to give the facts to the gentleman. I want to give the gentleman the facts as they actually occurred, and when he has time for sober reflection he can see that they are——

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order the gentleman is not debating the question.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is listening to the gentleman, and the Chair must say that the debate must pertain to the question.

Mr. PAYNE. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] rose out of order when the first paragraph was read——

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order the gentleman from New York is not speaking to his amendment. His amendment is to strike out the last word, which word is "Congress." He is not speaking to his amendment.

Mr. PAYNE. That is a pretty broad subject and includes even the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I make the point of order the gentleman must obey the rules of the House, although he has charge of the bill, and must, under the five-minute rule, confine his remarks to his amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is correct. The gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] must confine his remarks to the amendment. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I am rather glad of that ruling. Congress is a more pleasant subject to talk about than even the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS]. Now, Congress is an important institution. [Laughter.] It is a part of this Government. All laws must originate in the Congress of the United States. [Laughter and applause.] Congress is greater even than my friend from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS]. Because the greater, of course, includes the less, he is included in Congress, and thus Congress is greater than my friend from Mississippi.

Mr. WILLIAMS. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, in the midst of this important debate I decline to yield.

Mr. WILLIAMS. On the axiomatical proposition that the greater includes the less, I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. PAYNE. It is very important that the Congress should get hold of this message. That is a fact that is realized on both sides of this Chamber——

Mr. FITZGERALD. I rise to a question of order——

Mr. PAYNE. Unless my colleague is in error, as usual. [Laughter.]

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman's talk is incoherent and ranting. [Laughter on the Democratic side.]

Mr. PAYNE. I shall never be able to reach the understanding of my colleague from New York. I give that up. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. FITZGERALD. I ask for a ruling on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. PAYNE. I move that all debate on this resolution and all amendments thereto be now closed.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Now, Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the gentleman can not make that motion at this time. He has a motion pending to strike out the last word, and I insist that that motion shall be disposed of; and then I insist, that being disposed of, he having had the precedence granted to him by the Chair, in the Chair's opinion under the rules, my motion comes up and is in order. [Applause on the Democratic side.] The gentleman certainly has not precedence to make a series of motions not germane to one another and not connected with one another. Why, he has not yet shown the slightest reason why the word "Congress" ought to be stricken out. I could give a hundred reasons why it ought not to be stricken out. First, that it leaves the last clause of the bill without any sense in it——

Mr. PAYNE. I make the point of order.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I desire to be recognized on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair was ready to rule, but will hear the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. When a resolution or a bill is debated under the five-minute rule in committee, one speech not to exceed five minutes is allowed in the affirmative and five minutes' debate in the negative; and until that debate has taken place it is not in order to close debate on that paragraph or bill. Therefore I ask to be recognized in the negative of the proposition.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I ask to be recognized to represent the negative.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Now, Mr. Chairman, I rise at this moment for the purpose of opposing the motion made by the gentleman from New York to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. There is a point of order pending. The Chair understands the gentleman from New York to move that all debate upon the resolution and amendments thereto be now closed. The Ctair understands the gentleman from Mississippi makes the point of order that this motion is not now in order. The Chair has been listening to the gentleman and the gentleman from Alabama upon that point of order and is ready to rule. The Chair will quote from a ruling made in the second session in the Fifty-sixth Congress.

Mr. WILLIAMS. There is no doubt about that. Is the motion of the gentleman that the committee rise?

SEVERAL MEMBERS. Oh, no!

Mr. WILLIAMS. Very well.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will rule that the motion is in order, and will cite a ruling of the second session of the Fifty-sixth Congress, to the effect that in the five-minute debate a gentleman may be recognized for five minutes on an amendment, and the five minutes having expired, he may offer a motion that all debate close.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I offer an amendment that debate close in twenty minutes on this section.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Let me understand the ruling of the Chair. A parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I understand the gentleman from New York to have spoken in behalf of his motion and then to have moved that all debate close?

Mr. PAYNE. Immediately.

Mr. WILLIAMS. At the end of five minutes? Which was your motion?

Mr. PAYNE. To close all debate on the resolution and all amendments thereto.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Immediately?

Mr. PAYNE. Immediately; at once; now.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Now, then, without giving any opportunity to anybody to be heard in opposition to the motion which he had offered before the House. Now, the parliamentary inquiry. Am I not entitled to recognition for five minutes under the five-minute rule for the purpose of opposing the motion offered by the gentleman from New York?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would state that the motion to close debate is not debatable and is in order. It is for the committee to determine by its vote whether there shall be further debate. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"].

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I desire to offer a substitute for the pending motion and the amendment, that all debate on this resolution be closed in one hour.

The CHAIRMAN. If the committee will give the Chair attention, there are three motions pending. There is the motion of the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] that the debate close at once; there is the amendment proposed by the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] that debate close in twenty minutes; for which the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] offers a substitute that all debate close in one hour. The first motion to be put to the committee is the motion of the gentleman from Alabama that all debate close in one hour.

The question being taken, on a division (demanded by Mr. UNDERWOOD) there were—ayes 75, noes 94.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and the Chairman appointed Mr. UNDERWOOD and Mr. PAYNE.

The committee again divided and there were—ayes 71, noes 104.

Accordingly the substitute was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now comes upon the motion of the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] that all debate close in twenty minutes.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Division!

Mr. PAYNE. I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered and the Chairman appointed Mr. FITZGERALD and Mr. PAYNE.

The committee divided and the tellers reported—ayes 62, noes 95.

Accordingly the amendment of Mr. FITZGERALD was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now comes upon the motion of the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE].

Mr. WILLIAMS. I now move to amend the motion of the gentleman from New York by making the time limit of the debate ten minutes.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against that that the question has just been negatived, and also that it is dilatory.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Oh, no; the last motion was to limit the debate to twenty minutes.

Mr. PAYNE. Well, it is dilatory.

Mr. WILLIAMS. It is not dilatory at all.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that he desires in all fairness to give the committee an opportunity to determine how much debate is required, and at this time will rule that the motion is in order. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Mississippi, that debate close in ten minutes.

The question being taken, the Chairman announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Division!

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and the Chairman appointed Mr. WILLIAMS and Mr. PAYNE.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I ask that the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. CRAWFORD] take my place.

The committee divided, and the tellers reported—ayes 50, noes 70.

Accordingly the amendment of Mr. WILLIAMS was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE], that debate be now closed.

The question being taken, the Chairman announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Division!

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and the Chairman appointed Mr. PAYNE and Mr. WILLIAMS.

The committee divided, and the tellers reported—ayes 97, noes 63.

The CHAIRMAN. The motion is agreed to, and debate is closed.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Now, Mr. Chairman, I rise for the purpose of offering the following amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 6, page 1, after "means," insert the following:
"With instructions to bring in a bill in accordance with the recommendations of the President's message, putting wood pulp on the free list and reducing the duty on print paper."

Mr. PAYNE. I make the point of order that that is not germane.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state his point of order.

Mr. PAYNE. That it is not germane.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I want to be heard on the point of order, if the Chairman desires to hear me.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair asks the gentleman from New York to state his point of order.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, this is a resolution to send a part of the President's message to the Committee on Ways and Means. It is not germane to that to instruct the Committee on Ways and Means what to do.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Oh, yes; it is.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Now, if the gentleman is through, I should like to be heard on the point of order. My amendment comes in after the words "Ways and Means," line 6, page 1, and the language just immediately preceding the resolution is as follows:

That so much of the special message of the President of the United States communicated to the two Houses of Congress on January 31, 1908, as relates to the revenue and the bonded debt of the United States be referred to the Committee on Ways and Means.

"Be referred to the Committee on Ways and Means," for what purpose, in Heaven's name? Of course solely for the purpose of consideration and report to the House, or consideration and action in the committee room. Now, surely, nobody can hold——

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, to save time I withdraw the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is withdrawn. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, I demand a division.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered.

Mr. WILLIAMS and Mr. PAYNE were appointed tellers.

The House again divided, and the tellers reported—ayes 75, noes 89.

So the motion was rejected.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, and I will read it because it is written on the margin and I am afraid the Clerk can not do it.

In line 11, on page 1, after the word "judiciary," insert the following words:

With instructions to report H. R. 7636, being the bill introduced by Mr. CLAYTON, of Alabama, to prevent temporary restraining orders invalidating on ex parte testimony State laws, and H. R. 69, introduced by Mr. HENRY of Texas, providing in case of temporary injunctions for notice to the defendant and opportunity to be heard.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the amendment is not germane to the subject-matter of the text.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to be heard on that.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Mississippi. The Chair would like the attention of the gentleman from Mississippi. The Chair would like to have the amendment sent to the desk so that he can examine it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I will read it to the Chair. I am about to speak on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair wishes to examine the amendment.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I doubt if he can. He is welcome to try it. I scribbled it on the margin with a piece of lead pencil.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that in order to offer an amendment the gentleman must send the amendment to the Clerk's desk.

Mr. WILLIAMS. It has been sent to the Clerk's desk already.

Mr. MANN. It must be sent to the Clerk's desk to be read.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment has not yet been reported by the Clerk. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 11, on first page, after the word "judiciary," insert the following words:

"With instructions to report bill 7636, being the bill introduced by Mr. CLAYTON, of Alabama, to prevent temporary restraining orders invalidating on ex parte testimony State laws, and House bill 69, introduced by Mr. HENRY of Texas, providing in case of temporary injunction for notice to the defendant and opportunity to be heard."

Mr. WILLIAMS. Now, Mr. Chairman, on a point of order, if the Clerk will send me back the amendment. Mr. Chairman, the American House of Representatives to-night is making history. [Laughter on the Republican side.] You do not seem to know it, but you are doing it just the same. You can not go to the American people with the excuse for your omissions to legislate that the entire House was composed of a Speaker and a Committee on Ways and Means, and a chairman of that committee. But I want to come up to the point of order now, because I do not want to make a speech. The point of order, if there be anything in it at all, I suppose is intended by the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] to be made upon the ground that the amendment is not germane to the clause to which it is added, or to the resolution of which that clause is a part. Mr. Chairman, the clause reads:

That so much as relates to the judiciary of the United States, to the administration of justice, to the punishment and prevention of crime, to judicial proceedings, civil and criminal, and to the organization of courts be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

It is to be referred to that committee for the purpose of its doing its duty as a committee—that is, considering the matters, the particular subject-matters of the President's message so referred in the committee room, acting upon them, and making reports to the House or finishing with the action upon them in the committee. Now, it certainly is germane wherever a proposition is before the House of Representatives to refer a subject-matter to a standing committee to add as an amendment a provision to refer it with instructions to report in any general or particular way, to report out within a time generally, or to report out a particular measure, or to report out a measure containing certain general provisions. This amendment of mine merely says that when these matters are referred to the Committee on the Judiciary that the committee shall report out a bill, that it shall report out certain legislation pending before the committee contained in the message. Congress is the master, not the servant, of its standing committees, although this Republican majority does not seem to know that fact.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I insist the gentleman shall talk to the point of order.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I am talking to the point of order—and because the House is the master of its committees it has a right, when it refers matters to committees, to refer them with instructions to its servants to act.

Why, my heavens, Mr. Chairman, even the Ways and Means Committee can be instructed by the House of Representatives if the House chooses to do it. [Applause on the Democratic side.] You can not go back and hide behind—oh, if I were disposed to indulge in the sort of language the gentleman from New York sometimes does, I would say a pettish point of order like this. The gentleman was talking in the early part of the day about filibustering. Nobody is filibustering except yourselves. We are trying to get results.

Mr. PAYNE. Now, Mr. Chairman, I call the gentleman to order.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The man who really filibusters is the man who tries to prevent legislative results. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

Did the Chair rule I was out of order?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has not ruled. The Chair of course will ask the gentleman to debate the point of order and the Chair understands he has.

Mr. WILLIAMS. What is the Chair's ruling?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi will proceed in order.

Mr. WILLIAMS. In order; very well. I am glad to hear that, because I want to know it is the Chairman who rules me out of order, if I am ruled out at all, and not the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means [laughter and applause on the Democratic side] who rules me out of order, or by any of his cohorts who do not even rise in their places and respectfully address the Chair when they riotously call me to order. Now, Mr. Chairman, if the sole point of this point of order is nongermaneness, then the point of order must fall, for if the proposition to refer a matter to a committee with instructions be not germane to a proposition to refer the same matter to the committee generally, then it seems to me it would be past human ingenuity to find out anything that was germane to anything else.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will ask to have the amendment sent to the desk.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I would like to be heard briefly on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I desire to call the attention of the Chair to the fact that there is before the committee a message from the President of the United States, sent under power conferred on him by the Constitution. Jefferson's Manual, section 12, says:

The speeches, messages, and other matters of great concernment are usually referred to a Committee of the Whole House, where general principles are digested in the form of resolutions, which are debated and amended till they get into a shape which meets the approbation of a majority. These, being reported and confirmed by the House, are then referred to one or more select committees, according as the subject divides itself into one or more bills.

Before the committee at the present time is a resolution referring certain portions of the President's message to various select committees of the House. In this message, as examination will disclose, are contained recommendations in conformity with which bills named by the gentleman from Mississippi have been introduced and are pending before the House.

The gentleman from Mississippi offers an amendment that this resolution distributing a portion of the President's message to the various select committees shall contain instructions to those select committees to report in conformity with the recommendations of the President certain bills to carry into effect the recommendations. If it be not in order for the committee to recommend to the House that its committees be directed to report in a particular form measures embodying the recommendations of the President, then the whole practice of referring such messages as this and introducing resolutions to distribute the messages to the various committees of the House is an absolute futility. The purpose, as stated by Jefferson, is that the resolution may be so amended and perfected that the House may direct its committees to act in a certain way. This is no mere idle performance, or, rather, Mr. Chairman, if this House were properly constituted, it would be no mere idle performance to refer or distribute the President's message to various committees. I admit, considering what has happened, it is an idle performance to refer the President's message to the various committees; but the committee has the message before it now and it is competent to recommend to the House that the various portions of it be sent to the various select committees of the House, and has the power and the right to instruct the committees to take such action as will be in conformity with the will of the House.

A careful investigation of the rules and of the precedents does not disclose that this question of amending these resolutions in such a way has ever been brought up; but the rules do provide that when not otherwise provided Jefferson's Manual shall govern the proceedings of the House. It is quite apparent that if the purpose of sending this resolution and message to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union be as stated in section 12 of Jefferson's Manual, then there can be no doubt of the right of the committee to amend by placing instructions within this resolution so as to coerce unwilling committees to obey the will of the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands it is a well-established principle that it is not within the power of the House to order a committee to report a particular bill. What the House can not do directly the committee can not do indirectly. These bills are not before the House.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The bills are before the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. They can discharge the committee from the consideration of the bill.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Those bills are now before the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. It can not move to discharge.

Mr. PAYNE. Even the House can not do it unless they get the bills back from the Committee on the Judiciary.

The CHAIRMAN. That is as the Chair understands. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend by striking out the words "H. R. 7636," or whatever the number is, and leave just the general language of the provisions of the bill, without reference to the particular bill.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I ask the amendment be sent to the Clerk's desk in writing.

Mr. WILLIAMS. It is there in writing. I ask the Clerk to strike out H. R.——

Mr. FITZGERALD. Just say "a bill directing certain things." Mr. Chairman, to save time, I wish to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk proceeded to read the amendment.

Mr. PAYNE. That amendment has already been voted on.

Mr. MANN. It is simply the same paper that is already in the possession and files of the House, and the gentleman can not withdraw it for the purpose of offering it as an amendment again.

Mr. PAYNE. Do I understand the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] took the amendment that was in the possession of the Clerk of the House, and that has been offered, and made alterations in it?

Mr. MANN. That is it. I make the point he can not do it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I wish to offer an amendment, namely, strike out on page 2, the language contained in lines 13, 14, 15, and 16, "That so much as relates to the election of the President, Vice-President, or Representatives in Congress, be referred to the Committee on the Election of President, Vice-President, and Representatives in Congress," as there is nothing in the message referring to those subjects.

Mr. PAYNE. That is a matter for debate.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 2, strike out lines 13, 14, 15, and 16, being:
"That so much as relates to the election of the President, Vice-President, or Representatives in Congress, be referred to the Committee on the Election of President, Vice-President, and Representatives in Congress.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD].

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided, and there were—ayes 58, noes 97.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I demand tellers.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that that is a dilatory motion. I wish to call the attention of the Chair, and I wish to be heard a moment on that subject, if we can quell the riot——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] makes the motion that the motion is dilatory. The Chair will hear the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE].

Mr. PAYNE. The Chair can not fail to have noticed every time we had tellers the gentlemen upon that side of the Chamber, who have been filibustering now since 5 o'clock, used all the dilatory methods that they could in passing between the tellers in order to delay the proceedings. It was perfectly patent and evident that this has been dilatory, and I feel constrained to insist upon the point of order.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, if I may be indulged——

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Chairman, every time to-night before this time the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] has demanded tellers. Now, when this side has demanded tellers, he raises the question that it is dilatory. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will not hold the request for tellers to be dilatory, though it is in the power of the Chair to hold that it is dilatory if, in his opinion, it is for the purpose of delay. The Chair will not hold that it was for the purpose of delay, and will allow the demand for tellers if a sufficient number unite in the demand. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The question was taken, and tellers were ordered.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] and the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] will take their place as tellers.

The committee again divided, and tellers reported—yeas 67, noes 99.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment. Insert in line 11, page 1, after the word "judiciary," the following amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert in line 11, page 1, after the word "judiciary," with instructions to report a bill providing that no writ of injunction or temporary restraining order shall be granted in any case without reasonable previous notice to the adverse party, or his attorney, of the time and place of moving for the same: Provided, That nothing therein contained shall be held to authorize the issuance of any injunction or restraining order not now authorized by law.

Mr. PAYNE. I make the point of order against that amendment. It is not germane to the resolution.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I wish to be heard on the point of order.

Mr. PAYNE. It seems to be an attempt to legislate.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will ask the Clerk to again report the amendment.

The amendment was again reported.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided, and there were—ayes 43, noes 77.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, I now desire to offer the following amendment: In line 11, page 1, after the word "judiciary," insert:

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 11, after the word "judiciary," insert "with instructions to report a bill to limit the authority of circuit and district courts and circuit and district judges in granting injunctions and restraining orders upon ex parte orders invalidating State laws."

Mr. PAYNE. I make the point of order against that, if the Chair will allow me. There is nothing in the message that warrants anything like that.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Oh, yes; there is.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman from New York.

Mr. PAYNE. There is nothing in the world that would make that germane in any sense. The President has not recommended that.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The gentleman is mistaken in that statement.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair, of course, has the resolution before him. The Chair would like to have the gentleman from Mississippi indicate the language in the President's message to which this amendment is germane.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, I have not the President's message nor that part of it before me; but I think I can call to the memory of the Chair that part of the President's message to which it is germane. It is that part of the President's message in which he says that there ought to be a change of law regarding temporary restraining orders.

Mr. PAYNE. The President does not formulate any bill, as the gentleman is trying to do, and confine the Committee on the Judiciary to any such thing as that.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks that the amendment is germane. The question is on the amendment.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided, and there were—ayes 51, noes 87.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Tellers, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. PAYNE. I make the point of order once more that this is a dilatory proceeding, in view of the emphatic vote on the rising vote, and the repeated demand for tellers, with the evident purpose of delay on the part of these gentlemen.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The motion is not dilatory. The motion is for the purpose of emphasizing before the country by ocular demonstration party division upon this floor. It is a real and bona fide purpose, and is not for mere delay.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that the object of tellers is simply to verify the vote. A division was had, and the Chair will state that he counted with great care. The vote was so decisive—ayes 51, nays 87—that the Chair is justified in holding the demand for tellers to be dilatory.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. PAYNE. I move that the committee rise and report the resolution.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I rise for the purpose of respectfully taking an appeal from the decision of the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair can not entertain the appeal. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from New York.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the ayes appear to have it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The other side.

The question was again taken, and the Chairman announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Division! Not so fast.

The committee divided, and there were—ayes 99, noes 68.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Tellers, Mr. Chairman.

Tellers were ordered, and the Chairman appointed Mr. WILLIAMS and Mr. PAYNE.

The committee again divided, and the tellers reported—ayes 98, noes 70.

So the motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. LAWRENCE, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration House resolution 233, and had instructed him to report the same back with the recommendation that the same be agreed to.

Mr. PAYNE. I move the previous question on the resolution to its passage.

The question being taken, on a division (demanded by Mr. WILLIAMS) there were—ayes 125, noes 75.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I ask for tellers.

Mr. PAYNE. I make the point that that is a dilatory motion, in view of the emphatic vote by which this was carried.

The SPEAKER. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken, and there were—yeas 120, nays 84, answered "present" 24, not voting 160, as follows:

So the previous question was ordered.

The Clerk announced the following additional pairs:

For the balance of the day:

Mr. LORIMER with Mr. SPIGHT.

Mr. WASHBURN with Mr. LASSITER.

Mr. MCGAVIN with Mr. HARDY.

Mr. MCCALL with Mr. SMITH of Texas.

Mr. LILLEY with Mr. SHERWOOD.

Mr. EDWARDS of Kentucky with Mr. ALEXANDER of Missouri.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I wish to withdraw my vote and to answer "present." I wish to explain, because I have been voting in the Committee of the Whole. I find that while I was out at dinner I was paired by the Clerks with Mr. HILL of Mississippi. He was then present. When I returned Mr. HILL had gone. I was not aware of the pair. I suppose he relies upon its existence. I voted on this yea-and-nay roll call, and therefore I wish to withdraw that vote.

The SPEAKER. Call the gentleman's name.

The Clerk called the name of Mr. LITTLEFIELD, and he answered "present."

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing——

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. FITZGERALD. One moment, Mr. Speaker. I move to refer the resolution to the Committee on Rules with the following instructions——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is not recognized for that purpose. The Chair recognizes his colleague from New York, in charge of the bill.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I move to recommit the bill to the Committee on Ways and Means, and on that I demand the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The question is on ordering the previous question.

The question was taken, and a division was demanded by Mr. FITZGERALD.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I may as well ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The Clerk announced the following additional pairs:

Balance of day:

Mr. GOEBEL with Mr. HACKETT.

Mr. ADDISON D. JAMES with Mr. KIMBALL.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Speaker, I was listening and I did not hear my name called. I would like to ask if I am recorded.

Mr. SCOTT. I was listening and did not hear my name called.

The SPEAKER. Call the gentleman's name.

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. Speaker, I was listening and I did not hear my name called.

The SPEAKER. Call the gentleman's name.

Mr. REYNOLDS's name was called, and he answered "aye."

Mr. SAUNDERS. Mr. Speaker, I wish to vote. My attention was diverted at the very moment my name was called and the Clerk passed over my name.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman was giving attention and did not hear his name when it was called or should have been called?

URGENT DEFICIENCY BILL.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Appropriations I submit a privileged report upon the bill H. R. 19955, an act making appropriation to supply certain additional urgent deficiencies in the appropriation for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1908, with Senate amendments. I ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union be discharged from the consideration of the Senate amendments and that they be considered in the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent to discharge the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union from consideration of the amendments to the bill indicated and consider the Senate amendments in the House.

Mr. TAWNEY. And pending that request, Mr. Speaker, I want to state to the House that this is the urgent deficiency bill carrying a deficiency appropriation of $2,000,000 for armor and armament, and that unless the bill can be passed speedily the employment of the men in the Gun Factory at Washington Navy-Yard will necessarily be interfered with and the services of many of them will have to be dispensed with.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Reserving the right to object I wish to state that I think this matter——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman object? Neither gentlemen are in the status of recognition for yielding.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Reserving the right to object——

Mr. TAWNEY. I do not yield the floor.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota does not have the floor except for one purpose, and that is to ask unanimous consent, and all other things that follow touch unanimous consent.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I permitted the gentleman from Minnesota to make a statement.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi can ask the House for unanimous consent to make a statement if he desires.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, it has been quite usual on the floor to reserve the right to object.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. DALZELL. The regular order!

Mr. WILLIAMS. I object.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the Senate amendments to the urgent deficiency bill reported to the House.

The question was taken, and on a division (demanded by Mr. WILLIAMS), there were 140 ayes and 80 noes.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken, and there were—yeas 268, nays 1, answered "present" 9, not voting 110, as follows:

The Clerk announced the following additional pairs:

On this vote:

Mr. HALE with Mr. HAMMOND.

Mr. MADISON with Mr. WEISSE.

Mr. CALDERHEAD with Mr. CALDWELL.

Mr. LANDIS with Mr. LAMB.

For the balance of the day:

Mr. JENKINS with Mr. CLARK of Florida.

Until further notice:

Mr. KEIFER with Mr. TAYLOR of Alabama.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER with Mr. SPIGHT.

Mr. BARCHFELD with Mr. GOLDFOGLE.

Mr. LILLEY with Mr. LASSITER.

Mr. McGUIRE. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask how I am recorded.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is not recorded.

Mr. McGUIRE. I would like to be recorded.

The SPEAKER. Was the gentleman listening when his name was called?

Mr. McGUIRE. I was in the House trying to give attention, but some one was talking with me and my name slipped by without my noticing it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman hardly brings himself within the rule.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 19955, the urgent deficiency bill, with Senate amendments thereto.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the Senate amendments.

The Clerk read the Senate amendments.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, the first amendment of the Senate is the deficiency of $50,000 for the transportation of contract surgeons and officers of the Army. The amendment was made in the Senate because of the fact that the appropriation for the transportation of officers and contract surgeons of the Army is practically exhausted, or will be in the course of a week or ten days. The other deficiencies are small items—one for the purpose of supplying the police department with fuel and other items of subsistence, and the other is in relation to one of the wards in the Garfield Hospital, in the District of Columbia. I shall, when these amendments are read under the five-minute rule in Committee of the Whole, move to concur in all of them, and am directed by the Committee on Appropriations so to do.

I now move that the committee rise for the purpose of closing debate on this amendment.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question? I do not know that there is to be any difficulty about closing general debate. I should like, however, to ask two questions before the gentleman does that, if he will yield.

Mr. TAWNEY. I yield for a question.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The amendment respecting mileage in the Army provides for a deficiency of $50,000?

Mr. TAWNEY. Yes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Does that arise from these extraordinary horseback tests that the President has been holding during the present year?

Mr. TAWNEY. Ten thousand dollars is in consequence of what the gentleman from New York calls the extraordinary horseback tests.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I would be delighted to characterize them in any other way, if the gentleman can suggest some expression.

Mr. TAWNEY. Oh, I do not need to suggest anything to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. FITZGERALD. When the deficiency bill was before the House the gentleman from Minnesota, acting upon the testimony of the Secretary of the Navy, stated that the $2,000,000 for armor and armament must be appropriated in order to prevent the dismissal of men from the Gun Factory at the navy-yard here. Since the bill passed the House, a large number of those men, 250 I am informed, have been furloughed for ninety days. Now, is there any prospect that if the appropriation is made these men will be restored to work before the expiration of the furlough?

Mr. TAWNEY. In answer to the gentleman from New York I will read from page 9 of the hearings a statement made by Secretary Metcalf:

> Mr. METCALF. Understand me: We have on hand at the present time sufficient money to meet every obligation of the Department. There is no deficiency at the present time. Now, we can take this money; with it we can pay for armor when it is delivered, but we have practically to stop work at the Washington Gun Factory and at some of the navy-yards of the country. We purchase the rough forgings, the gun mounts, and things of that kind, and then the finished product is turned out by the Washington Navy-Yard. We can pursue one of two courses. We can take the money on hand at the present time and meet the obligations, but in that case we would have to stop work at the navy-yards and discharge the men. Or we can continue the work at the navy-yard in the manufacture of armament, and so on, and help up the bills. It is for Congress to decide which of these two courses we shall pursue.

In accordance with that statement the Committee on Appropriations within two days after the estimate was submitted to the committee, through the Speaker of the House, reported out this urgent deficiency bill, carrying $2,000,000, the amount of the deficiency estimated for the purpose of continuing if possible the employment of the men in the Gun Factory in Washington Navy-Yard. The bill was passed promptly by the House. It went to the Senate. It was returned here with three or four amendments, the principal one of which is the mileage amendment for the Army. Consent was asked, by myself, of the House to consider these amendments in the House instead of in the Committee of the Whole, and that was denied by the minority leader of the House. The bill then went to the Committee on Appropriations and has now been reported with the Senate amendments and is now awaiting favorable action by the House itself. When that action is taken, Congress will have provided for the payment of the armor and the employment of the men in the Gun Factory, if the Navy Department desires to continue their employment.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Is the gentleman from Minnesota able to explain the action of the Department? The House within two days reported a bill. It was passed promptly and went to the Senate, and within three or four days the bill went through both Houses. Within a day or two it will become a law. Yet, although the Secretary states that this appropriation will enable the Department, and was intended by the Department, to keep employed the men at this navy-yard in Washington, he has furloughed a large number of men for ninety days. I suggest that that is not keeping faith either with the gentleman from Minnesota or with the House.

Mr. TAWNEY. I can only explain or answer the gentleman by saying that the Secretary of the Navy, having once served in the House of Representatives and being familiar with the delays incident to the tactics that are now being employed by the minority and have been for several days, came to the conclusion that rather than risk continuing the employment of men without money to pay for their services he would adopt the other policy of furloughing them. [Applause on the Republican side.] Mr. Chairman, I insist upon my motion.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Will the gentleman from Minnesota yield to me for a question?

Mr. TAWNEY. I insist upon my motion that the committee do now rise.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I merely want to ask the gentleman a question——

Mr. TAWNEY. I have not yielded.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced the ayes seemed to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. WILLIAMS) there were—ayes 112, noes 61.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. DALZELL, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 19955, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the urgent deficiency bill, and that all debate on the bill and Senate amendments be closed.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota moves that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the urgent deficiency bill with Senate amendments, and, pending that motion, moves that all debate be now closed.

Mr. TAWNEY. And on that I move the previous question.

Mr. SPEAKER. And on that the gentleman from Minnesota moves the previous question.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced the ayes seemed to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. WILLIAMS) there were—ayes 136, noes 80.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I ask for tellers.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi demands tellers.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, in order to save the time of the House, I will ask for the yeas and nays. [Laughter.]

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken, and there were—yeas 148, nays 94, answered "present" 12, not voting 134, as follows:

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. GAINES of West Virginia). The gentleman is not recorded.

Mr. MAYNARD. I desire to vote.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Was the gentleman present and listening when his name should have been called?

Mr. MAYNARD. I was present and listening and did not hear my name called.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Call the gentleman.

The name of Mr. MAYNARD was called and he voted "aye."

The result of the vote was then announced, as above recorded.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. MANN in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the Senate amendments to the bill (H. R. 19955), the urgent deficiency bill. By order of the House, general debate on this bill and Senate amendments is closed.

Mr. TAWNEY. I ask the Clerk to read the first Senate amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT.

Pay of the Army: "For mileage to officers and contract surgeons when authorized by law, $50,000."

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, the deficiency in the annual appropriation——

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. A parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will suspend. The gentleman will state his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I do not want to block anything, but if there is going to be any debate, I think that we should have it on both sides.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will suspend.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. There has been no debate on the Senate amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Gentlemen will suspend. Under order of the House general debate upon the Senate amendments is ended; but the committee is entitled to debate under the five-minute rule upon a motion either for concurrence or nonconcurrence in the Senate amendments.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman please state his motion?

Mr. TAWNEY. I simply want to state——

Mr. FITZGERALD. I rise to a question of order. If the gentleman has the floor he must submit a motion. I rise for the purpose of making a motion.

Mr. TAWNEY. I was about to make a motion that all debate on the Senate amendment just read be closed in five minutes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I make the point of order that that motion is not now in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman can not make that motion until five minutes' debate.

Mr. TAWNEY. I have already debated the amendment.

SEVERAL MEMBERS. Oh, no!

Mr. TAWNEY. I move that the House recommend concurrence in the Senate amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman moves that the House concur in the Senate amendment.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I rise to make a preferential motion. I move that the House concur in the Senate amendment with an amendment striking out "fifty" and inserting "forty," so that it will read "$40,000," and upon that I wish to be heard.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will send his motion in writing to the Clerk's desk to be read.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I move to concur in the Senate amendment with an amendment striking out "fifty thousand" and inserting "forty thousand."

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair can not wait too long. The gentleman must have his amendment ready.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Well, I have the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will send his amendment to the Clerk's desk.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It is to strike out "fifty" and insert "forty."

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa will state his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Does not a motion to concur, which will bring the two Houses together, take precedence over a motion to concur with an amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the motion to concur with an amendment takes precedence.

Mr. FITZGERALD. There is no disagreement here.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the motion of the gentleman from New York.

The Clerk read as follows:

Concur with an amendment striking out the word "fifty" and inserting in lieu thereof "forty."

Mr. FITZGERALD. The object of this amendment is, if possible, to put a stop to a very improper practice that has been initiated by the President of the United States. This amendment of the Senate carries $10,000 for the purpose of supplying a deficiency in the mileage of the Army, caused by the extraordinary so-called "horseback tests," to which the Army officers were subjected during the past year. I have in mind a case where a distinguished officer in the Engineer Corps, stationed at the city of New York in charge of harbor work, was ordered by a strenuous Executive to take this 15-mile ride. This gentleman happens to weigh something over 300 pounds. [Laughter.] He is engaged entirely in engineering work. When he is not sitting in his chair in his office, he is being carried about the harbor of New York in a boat. [Laughter.] And yet in order to determine whether he was qualified to perform the duties of his office, a strenuous President, pictures of whom seated on a horse leaping barriers have been circulated throughout the country—pictures taken by placing the camera upon the ground, so as to emphasize the height of the jump [laughter]—directed this man to go to the place appointed and if possible emulate if not outdo him in horseback riding tests. I wish I had or could use the correspondence that I am informed is on file in the War Department on this question of compelling this officer to take this test. I have been informed that the officer, when asked if he thought he could stand the ride, replied that he could, but he was not so sure about the horse. [Laughter.]

What folly! Not only do we now put surgeons in command of ships, but we make them ride horses in order to find out if they are qualified physicians. Not only do engineer officers pass examinations to see if they are qualified to conduct the ordinary engineering operations, but they must be so skilled in horseback riding that they will outdo the most proficient of that distinguished military organization known as the "Rough Riders." [Laughter.]

Mr. Chairman, I should have liked yesterday if my colleague had been in good humor, to have discussed another subject not particularly germane to this paragraph, but affecting to some extent the Chief Executive of the Union. I am inclined to believe that my colleague from New York had some information that I had a seething speech buried within my vitals upon the subject of the Chief Executive, and to prevent me being relieved of that speech he conducted a seven-hour filibuster.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, to proceed for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I must object, and I move that all debate on the amendment, and amendments thereto, be closed in two minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota moves that all debate upon the pending Senate amendments and the amendments thereto be closed in two minutes.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. TAWNEY. I yield the two minutes to the gentleman from New York. [Applause.]

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I wish that my speech were a two-minute speech, but it would be impossible to do justice to the things I had in mind. But I wish now to call the attention of the House to this fact, that yesterday, during the excitement of the proceedings, I moved to strike out one of the paragraphs of the resolution introduced by the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] to distribute the President's message.

I have read that message carefully, the message of January 31, and I have been unable to find any reference in it to the election of the President or Vice-President or Representatives in Congress. I wished to criticise at some length the attitude of the President of the United States, his insincerity and his hypocrisy, regarding the publication of campaign contributions, and it was upon the motion to strike out that paragraph that my remarks would have been made. I think that my colleague should either read these messages himself when he prepares such resolutions or else he should be sure that the men who read them for him will read them knowingly and intelligently, and know what is in the message when preparing his resolution of distribution.

Mr. Chairman, of course I do not hope to have the motion offered by me adopted. I know that the President, as Commander in Chief of the Army, can order these rides, can coerce officers into taking them, can put upon the retired list, and thus make an unnecessary additional burden to the people the men well qualified to perform duties required of them. If this practice is to be extended, just think of the spectacle that will be presented when the President will command my distinguished colleague, the Republican leader, to mount a horse, go to Chevy Chase, and on horseback emulate him over the steeplechase course. [Laughter and applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the motion that I made.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the motion offered by the gentleman from Minnesota, to concur in the Senate amendments.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next Senate amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, after line 14, insert:

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Police court: For fuel, gas, laundry work, stationery, printing, preservation of records, mops, brooms, buckets, removal of ashes and refuse, telephone service, and all other incidental expenses not otherwise provided for, $500.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I move that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union recommend concurrence in the Senate amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota moves that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union recommend concurrence in the Senate amendment.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, that is not in order. I understood the gentleman to couple with it the motion shutting off debate.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman did not make that motion.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I will state that the Senate amendment involves a deficiency of $5,000——

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. We have agreed to shut off debate and made a rule that debate is not in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee agreed to close debate on the first Senate amendment. This is the second Senate amendment.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of the amendment is to supply a small deficiency in the supplies and fuel for the police department of the District of Columbia. I do not think further explanation or discussion is necessary, and I move that all debate on this Senate amendment be closed in three minutes.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman a question. Who is responsible for this deficiency?

Mr. TAWNEY. The police department of the District of Columbia is responsible to a certain extent in that they did not, it seems, contemplate all of the expenditures in the estimates that would be necessary for the fiscal year.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Are these persons amenable to that celebrated statute you had passed making it a criminal offense to create a deficiency?

Mr. TAWNEY. They are not.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Why not?

Mr. TAWNEY. Because this is not one of the appropriations that is included in the antideficiency statute.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Why was this omitted from the statute?

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate upon this amendment and the amendments thereto be closed in two minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota moves that all debate on the pending Senate amendment and amendments thereto be closed in two minutes.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

Mr. CARLIN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Concur with the following amendment: "That the Secretary of the Navy shall not use any portion of the sum appropriated for armor and armament until all the men now under furlough at the Washington Navy-Yard be restored to work.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, while I sympathize with the embarrassment of the gentleman from Virginia on account of the attitude of his side of the House toward the passage of this bill, the appropriation of $2,000,000 for armor and armament is not before the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and the amendment is not germane. I therefore make a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Senate amendment which is now before the House for consideration relates to the police court of the District of Columbia. In the opinion of the Chair, the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia in relation to the manufacture of armor is not germane to an amendment relating to the police court in the District of Columbia, and the Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. CARLIN. Mr. Chairman, I think the Chair must have misread what I sent to the desk. It must be some other paper he has read from. Perhaps it is some irrelevant matter at the head of the paper which I sent to the desk. I should like to have the Chair have read the amendment that I intended to be read.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment which the gentleman heard read by the Clerk was an amendment relating to armor and the Secretary of the Navy.

Mr. CARLIN. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. It has no relation whatever to supplies in the police court.

Mr. CARLIN. Are we discussing the question of supplies in the police court?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Minnesota——

Mr. CARLIN. Mr. Chairman, have I not two minutes in which to discuss that motion?

The CHAIRMAN. The two minutes have expired.

Mr. CARLIN. But I have not had any time.

The CHAIRMAN. Those in favor of the motion of the gentleman from Minnesota will say "aye"——

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a point of order. The time in which debate was to close can not be considered as having expired while the committee has been engaged in the discussion of a point of order. The Chair does not mean to make any such rule as that, I am sure. I insist that the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. CARLIN] is entitled to two minutes in which to discuss the motion before the committee.

Mr. CARLIN. I do not care to ask for any time, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Minnesota that the committee recommend that the House concur in the Senate amendment.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the next Senate amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, after line 14, insert:
"Garfield Hospital: For additional amount required for isolating ward for minor contagious diseases at Garfield Hospital, $2,000."

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee recommend that the House concur in the Senate amendment just read.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I wish to acquire information for people who have asked me recently whether when these amendments are concurred in by the House and this bill is signed the Secretary of the Navy will put back to work the 250 men laid off for ninety days on the 1st of April?

Mr. TAWNEY. I will state that what the Secretary of the Navy may do after he gets this appropriation is not within my province to state. I do not know. I only know what he said when before the committee he would do in the event the appropriation was granted.

In regard to the amendment, Mr. Chairman, that is now under consideration, I have a letter from the Commissioners of the District and also one from one of the trustees of the Garfield Hospital, showing the necessity for this deficiency appropriation of $2,000 on account of maintaining the isolating ward in that institution during the balance of the current fiscal year. The hospital authorities in replying to the request of the Commissioner for information state that at present that deficiency appropriation is not only needed, as shown by the accompanying statement, but that the funds provided for the maintenance of the isolating ward are about exhausted and that immediate relief is necessary.

Mr. Chairman, I now move to close all debate on the pending Senate amendment and amendments thereto, unless some gentleman desires a minute or two.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Minnesota that all debate on the pending Senate amendment and amendments thereto be now closed.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on agreeing to the motion of the gentleman from Minnesota that the committee recommend concurrence in the Senate amendment.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the next amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, after line 14, insert:
"One-half of the foregoing amounts to meet deficiencies in the appropriations on account of the District of Columbia shall be paid from the revenues of the District of Columbia and one-half from any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated."

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee recommend concurrence in the amendment just read.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman a question. What was the necessity of this? Is not this a part of the general law, anyway?

Mr. TAWNEY. No; it is not.

Mr. WILLIAMS. To what part of the expenditures does this refer?

Mr. TAWNEY. It refers to the $500 appropriated to supply a deficiency in the appropriation for fuel and supplies for the police department, and $2,000 for the Garfield Hospital for the maintenance of the isolating ward. When appropriations like this are made, unless this provision is carried, the money would all be paid out of the Treasury instead of half out of the Treasury and half out of the revenues of the District.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Minnesota that the committee recommend concurrence in the Senate amendment.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, that is the last of the Senate amendments, and I move that the committee do now rise and report the amendments of the Senate to the House, with the recommendation of the committee that the House concur in the Senate amendments.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman, before we get out of the committee, what is the cause of this deficiency in armor? Why is it? We have it every year

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I do not know where the gentleman from Tennessee was when the urgent deficiency bill passed the House. The matter was fully gone into at that time, and there has been so much unnecessary delay in the passage of these Senate amendments to-day that I do not care to take up time with any further explanations.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I would like the gentleman to yield to me for a minute and I will tell where I was and what I was doing.

Mr. TAWNEY. I have not the time to yield.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate can proceed only by unanimous consent. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Minnesota that the committee do now rise and report the amendments of the Senate to the House, with the recommendation that the Senate amendments be concurred in.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose, and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. MANN, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 19955, the urgent deficiency bill, with Senate amendments thereto, and had directed him to report the same back to the House with the recommendation that the House concur in the Senate amendments.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to taking the vote upon these amendments en bloc? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The question is on concurring in the Senate amendments.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, upon that I desire a yea-and-nay vote.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken, and there were—yeas 236, answered "present" 15, not voting 137, as follows:

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, I submit a privileged report from the Committee on Rules.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania submits a privileged report from the Committee on Rules, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That immediately on the adoption of this rule the House shall, without further motion, resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 20063, a bill making appropriations for the District of Columbia; the first reading of the bill shall be dispensed with; and then, after two hours of general debate (the time to be equally divided between the majority and minority), the bill shall be considered under the five-minute rule.

Mr. DALZELL. The purpose of this resolution, Mr. Speaker, is to expedite the public business——

Mr. DE ARMOND. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order. Yesterday, on the request of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. GARDNER], the House, by unanimous consent, fixed eight hours of debate upon this District of Columbia bill, and I make the point of order that what the House by unanimous consent has done can not be undone by report of the Committee on Rules or by the proposed action of the House if it be the action of but a majority. I would ask the Clerk to read the paragraph on page 4461 of the RECORD.

Mr. DALZELL. The very purpose of this resolution is to get rid of that order.

Mr. DE ARMOND. The point I make is that you can not, by a majority or by anything except unanimous consent or a unanimous vote, get rid of something done by the House by unanimous consent. That is the point I make upon the rule, and in order that I may be understood, Mr. Speaker, I would like to have the Clerk read the paragraph.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering the bill (H. R. 20063) making appropriations for the District of Columbia for the ensuing fiscal year, and, pending that motion, I ask unanimous consent that eight hours be allowed for general debate, half of the time to be controlled by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BURLESON], the ranking member of the minority, and the other half by myself.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan moves that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the District of Columbia appropriation bill, and, pending that motion, asks unanimous consent that general debate may be limited to eight hours, one-half to be controlled by himself and one-half by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BURLESON]. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the gentleman from Michigan.

The question was taken, and the motion was not agreed to.

Mr. DE ARMOND. Now, I make the point of order, Mr. Speaker, that the time of debate having been settled by unanimous consent it can not be settled otherwise by the adoption of a rule unless the rule be adopted unanimously, or unless by the unanimous consent of the House upon request.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman hold that what the House does it can not undo?

Mr. DE ARMOND. No; he does not hold that, but he holds that what the House does unanimously the Committee on Rules can not undo, and that can not be undone except by unanimous action of the House. And for one I am opposed to the adoption of the rule, and therefore it can not be unanimous.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman think that the unanimous consent given yesterday by the House is of any higher dignity than the vote which has just been announced, namely, 232 yeas to no nays?

Mr. DE ARMOND. No; I do not think that. The point I am making is this, that a proposition to undo by virtue of a rule or in any other way what the House itself has done by unanimous consent can not be entertained if anybody makes a point of order or anybody objects. In making the point of order I object, of course.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is ready to rule, and overrules the point of order. The Chair does not assent to the proposition that what the House may do to-day may not be undone to-morrow. Even to the matter of where there was a vote of 232, which has just been given in the affirmative, and none in the negative, it is quite competent for the House, if it should desire to do so in a proper way, to reverse its action. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. DE ARMOND. Mr. Speaker, I would like to make a parliamentary inquiry in order to understand the position of the Chair. If I understood the Chair, then, the ruling is, that by unanimous vote the House can undo with reference to this matter what it did by unanimous consent yesterday?

The SPEAKER. The House, under the Constitution, can do anything by a majority vote.

Mr. DE ARMOND. Let me ask the Speaker about that, because I would like to understand it if I can. Does the Speaker hold that the House, by a majority vote, can undo what the House by a unanimous consent has established with reference to a particular matter?

The SPEAKER. Yes; it can if the motion is properly made and a majority of the House, a quorum being present, should conclude to undo it.

Mr. DE ARMOND. Now, let me ask the Speaker this: Suppose that immediately after that had been settled by unanimous consent, or five or ten minutes after, there had been a motion made that debate be limited to two hours instead of the eight hours agreed upon, would the Speaker say that a majority of the House could negative the rule established by unanimous consent?

The SPEAKER. It has to be done under a rule, and such motion would not be in order under the rules as they stand, but under the Constitution the House can make its rules and regulations, and change them, or amend them; and this, as the rules provide, is a report from the Committee on Rules, which is a privileged committee, and proposes to the House not only to do away with the unanimous consent, but to impose other terms that would exist under the rules as we now have them; and the very object of the organization of the House, with a Committee on Rules with that privilege, is to give the House an opportunity to do anything in the event the House, proceeding in an orderly way, desires so to do. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. DE ARMOND. Mr. Speaker, I would like to appeal from the ruling of the Chair, not captiously, but because I think it wrong.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can hardly appeal from an answer to a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. DE ARMOND. I would like to appeal from the ruling of the Chair on the point of order.

Mr. DALZELL. Too late.

The SPEAKER. The Chair settled the point of order; there was no appeal taken; and then the gentleman, after that matter was concluded, made a parliamentary inquiry; and the gentleman in his very interesting manner, and the Chair, to the best of the Chair's ability, in an uninteresting manner, have been holding a private conversation. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. DE ARMOND. Mr. Speaker, it is very interesting when the Chair decides that a majority can undo what was done unanimously. That is a very interesting proposition.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, I think the Speaker might have added as an additional reason for his ruling that this House has gone out of the unanimous-consent business. Now, the object and purpose of this rule is to expedite the public business. It is to enable the House to go into Committee of the Whole by one roll call, and it is to provide also that it shall not be necessary that the bill be read at length, and that there shall be general debate of two hours only. I do not believe I need say anything to the House in justification of this rule. The antics of gentlemen on the other side yesterday and today demonstrate that, absolutely powerless to enact any legislation themselves, they are intending to obstruct and prevent legislation upon the part of the majority. I do not deny, Mr. Speaker, the right of the minority—the constitutional right of the minority—to perform in this manner. They have the right to spend the public time in roll calls because the Constitution has given them that right; but equally, on the other side, exists the right of the majority, charged with legislation, to put into force all its power, all the power that it has, to carry into execution its will. [Loud applause on the Republican side.] I think we will be able to demonstrate from this time out not only that the minority shall not enact any legislation, but that the legislation of the majority will be such as the majority desires to pass, in its own way, and at its own time, by exercise of the rules of this House. [Loud applause on the Republican side.] I now demand the previous question.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I want to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. BURLESON. I want to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, I insist upon the previous question. [Loud applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. WILLIAMS. I would like to ask the gentleman a question. The gentleman took part of his time before demanding the previous question. If he will yield that much time to this side——

Mr. NORRIS. I would like to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania if this general debate must be on the bill?

Mr. DALZELL. In general debate; not necessarily on the bill.

Mr. NORRIS. I would like to ask the gentleman if he would not be willing to yield to a motion to make it on the bill.

Mr. DALZELL. Oh, no.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. BURLESON. On yesterday we entered into a solemn agreement that we should have eight hours of debate. That time has been parceled out——

Mr. MANN. It has been wasted on that side.

Mr. BURLESON. By fair and square deal we ought to have that time.

Mr. MANN. It has been wasted on that side.

Mr. DALZELL. The time of the gentleman on the other side has already been more than wasted by useless roll calls. [Great applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. And that side has wasted three months doing nothing, and very little of that.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania to yield for a question.

Mr. DALZELL. I decline to yield, and insist upon the previous question.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I merely wanted to ask if you would give the same time as you have occupied yourself.

(Cries of "Regular order!")

The SPEAKER. The gentleman demands the previous question.

The question was taken on ordering the previous question, and the Speaker announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Division!

The House divided, and there were—ayes 150, noes 95.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I ask for tellers.

Mr. PAYNE. I make the point of order that that is dilatory after the decided vote we have had.

Mr. WILLIAMS. What is the point of order?

Mr. PAYNE. That it is simply dilatory after the vote we have had.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will ask the gentleman from Mississippi and let the gentleman himself determine. Does the gentleman consider his demand as a dilatory proceeding? [Laughter.]

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I shall not attempt to usurp the place to which you have been elected. [Laughter.] I will merely reply that it seems curious to me that any intellect, even that of the gentleman from New York, should consider an effort to postpone, even for a short while, an attempt to gag a whole party as being solely dilatory. If there is any parliamentary self-defense under God's law it is that. I ask for tellers, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. As the preponderance of the vote was so large in favor of the proposition, and as the gentleman from Mississippi declines to state what the Chair, with a very ordinary intellect, as it seems to the Chair, is able to realize, the Chair feels that he is authorized to sustain the point of order. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I now ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken, and there were—yeas 140, nays 109, answered "present" 13, not voting 126, as follows:

Accordingly, in pursuance of the resolution, the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 20063, the District of Columbia appropriation bill, with Mr. DALZELL in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the title of the bill.

The Clerk reported the title of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the order of the House the first reading of the bill has been dispensed with and general debate for two hours is now in order. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. GARDNER] is now recognized.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I would not presume on the time of the House to make any extended statement relative to the pending bill were it not that there are some unusual things attending it. In the first place, the bill reports in round numbers $800,000 less for the current expenses for the ensuing year than was allowed for this year, and in round numbers $4,000,000 less than the estimates for the ensuing year. Your committee feels that some statement is due relative to these measures in advance of consideration under the five-minute rule. The revenues from the District for the year for which this bill provides are estimated at $5,900,000. The Federal Government supplements that with like amount. So that the anticipated revenues are $11,800,000. This bill recommends an appropriation of $9,436,289, exclusive of the revenues from the water department. I want to say that this difference is more apparent than real, as affecting the current expenses. Nearly the whole of the $800,000 less in this bill than was carried in the one a year ago is taken up by appropriations made in the bill last year for the completion of projects then under way but not properly chargeable to the current expense fund. For example, $550,000 of the $800,000 was carried in the bill last year for the completion of the municipal building.

The occupancy of that building on or about the 1st of July will save the Government in excess of $10,000 in rents, so that we have $560,000 in that one item. Then there was carried in the bill of last year $80,000 for a new pier at the highway bridge, $66,000 for the Delacarlia reservoir, $44,000 for the completion of a bridge over the Baltimore and Ohio railroad on Monroe street, in the vicinity of the Catholic University, $25,000 more for the placing of metal file cases in the office of the clerk of the supreme court of the District of Columbia. These and several other lesser items, which were in the nature of appropriations for extraordinary projects taken from the amount last year makes the current expenses of the ensuing year about the same that they are this year. From another standpoint of view, however, the discrepancy seems even more marked, but when it is recalled that the estimates asked for $2,000,000 more than the revenues, it leaves only an excess of a little over two million of dollars, counting what the Government gives above what the committee appropriates. You ask me to reconcile that difference. Taking out the Government's appropriation, it will leave in round numbers a million of dollars surplus. Why, is it asked, do you want that amount of surplus? We will endeavor to explain that. In the first place, for twenty-one years preceding 1901 the District government ran within its revenues every year save one, and that year there was a deficit of only $5,000 in round numbers. There were two years during that period in which the excess of revenues over expenditures exceeded $1,000,000. In 1901 the city entered a new era of development. Since that time, namely, within the last seven and one-half years, there have been undertaken and substantially completed several important and, upon the whole, very necessary enterprises. One of these, and the most expensive, was the establishment and installation of the new filtration system.

Another was the completion of the sewage-disposal plant. Another was the completion of the new municipal building, to which reference has been already made. Another was the completion of the present police-court building. Another was the purchase of the extensive grounds out on Fourteenth street and the rearing of a tuberculosis hospital, which will be occupied in the course of a few weeks. Another was the purchase of an extensive tract of ground at Blue Plains and the construction thereon of a home for the aged and infirm, and upon a portion of the same tract has been built a school for colored boys—a sort of reform school. The buildings are already completed, and the school is in operation.

In addition to these there has been the construction of the Connecticut Avenue Bridge, the Highway Bridge, the Massachusetts Avenue Bridge, the Anacostia Bridge, and the Piney Branch Bridge. These cover, substantially, what might be termed the "extraordinary improvements" already made within the last seven and a half years. I left out two important things—the part that the city contributes toward the new Union Station and the elimination of grade crossings. I think that covers all, substantially, what might be termed the "extraordinary improvements." These have aggregated nearly $17,000,000, of which the Government pays one half and the District of Columbia the other half. There will be on the 1st of July an unfunded debt a little in excess of $4,000,000. On the 1st day of July, 1901, there was not a dollar of unfunded debt. In addition to the unfunded, the funded debt amounts to a little over $11,000,000, so that the debt of the District on the 1st of July will exceed $15,000,000.

Now, the money for the unfunded debt was secured in this way: Congress passed some years ago a law authorizing the District to borrow from the Federal Government at 2 per cent for certain improvements, the time to run for five years and payable within that limit. That limit has been extended every year, and each year the aggregate of indebtedness has increased. Your committee has felt, and now feels and recommends accordingly to this body, that inasmuch as these extraordinary improvements have been made and substantially completed, every one of them within the appropriation now allowed, and that inasmuch as there was an agreement on the part of the District to pay back that borrowed money within a specified time, we ought to begin to make good the promise of the District. And so, if this bill carries as the committee recommends, the District will be able to pay in round numbers a million dollars on the unfunded debt from the revenues of this year. It may be asked how that can be done without seriously jeopardizing the interests of the city in its current affairs. The committee believes that it can be done and done without appreciably affecting the current interests of the city. In the first place, I would like to call attention specifically to wherein we propose to make some savings, not only on the estimates, but under the estimated revenues. On page 7 of this report, you have it, if you will observe, for salaries an estimate of $742,000 plus. This bill recommends $649,000 plus, making a saving in the item of salaries of $92,743, and I may say in passing that there are but few salaries increased in the entire District list. One-third of this $92,000, in round numbers is accounted for in the difference between what was asked, namely, $60,835, for the care of the new District building, and the amount recommended by the committee, namely, $30,240, making a difference in the care of the District building of $29,000 plus, and we believe, for the amount recommended, that it can be well cared for, too. If you will refer to page 9 of the report, you will find for "improvements and repairs" that the estimates are $1,239,000, and the bill carries $985,000, making a difference between the estimates and the recommended appropriation of $250,000.

The principal item from which this saving arises is, first, repairs to streets, avenues, and alleys. Last year the Congress was deemed exceedingly liberal and appropriated for this purpose $300,000. The estimates for the ensuing year are $400,000. Your committee recommends $300,000, or the same amount as last year. For repairs of county roads the committee recommends $100,000. The estimates were $125,000, and last year we had, in addition, the construction of the bridge over the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad, to which reference has been made. That does not appear this year. These items make up nearly the whole difference.

Mr. WEEKS. Will the gentleman submit to a question?

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Assuredly.

Mr. WEEKS. I understand that there is now an unfunded debt of $4,000,000. Is that entirely carried by the Government?

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. On the 1st day of July the whole of it will be carried by the Government, and between three and four million dollars at this time.

Mr. WEEKS. Does the District pay the Government interest on this money?

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Two per cent. The next item represents a large amount, and I would like to call the attention of the Committee of the Whole House to this. It is found on page 12, and estimates for schools $4,147,590. The amount recommended in this bill is $2,401,000. The difference between the recommended appropriation and the estimates is $1,746,000.

The estimates for new buildings alone call for $1,936,000. The committee recommends in direct appropriation $354,500, and an authorization for enough more to bring this up to $533,500. Last year the Congress gave $535,000 for construction of new buildings—$80,000 in excess of the estimates. The committee believed then that they had gone to the extreme liberality in this respect. This year, as I say, the estimates are nearly $2,000,000 for this purpose. The committee recommend in direct appropriation an authorization substantially the same as last year. There was another thing that controlled the action of the committee, in part, touching this matter. There was appointed a commission to investigate carefully as to the best type of school buildings and report. That report has not yet been made, and your committee believed that until that report is made and investigated and really accepted, it is better to go conservatively than extravagantly in the matter of new buildings relative to the schools. Then, again, that commission is required to report a general plan for the consolidation of the public schools in the District of Columbia, and the abandonment and sale of such school buildings and sites as may by them be deemed necessary and desirable for the best good of the public school service. So that, for these various reasons, it was thought best to keep within the limits named.

In the Health Department there is a difference between the estimates and the recommended appropriations of $92,000. There is a saving of $70,000 in these four estimates, namely, removal of weeds, site for pound, erection and equipment of pound, and stable for smallpox hospital. Your committee believes that there is not a single one of these but that can go for another year, with the possible exception of the cutting of the weeds, without a special appropriation, and no interest suffer materially thereby.

Mr. CRUMPACKER rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. GARDNER] yield to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER]?

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Certainly.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I notice an estimate for the salaries of the Metropolitan police of $1,021,413.25, and that the appropriation recommended is $915,293.35.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. What page is that on?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. That is on page 12 of the report.

It follows the item of public schools in the order of arrangement on page 12 of the report. There has been considerable discussion in the newspapers and otherwise in relation to the inadequacy of the police in the city of Washington. I would like to know of the gentleman from Michigan if the safety of people upon the streets of the city was duly considered in recommending the appropriation that is carried in the bill of something over $100,000 less than the estimates made by the Commissioners in the point of salaries?

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. If the gentleman will allow me, I will be very glad to take that up as the last item instead of in the order it appears here.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I would not have called the gentleman's attention to it now excepting for the fact that in the arrangement on page 12 it comes after the schools. If the gentleman intends to take it up later, of course that will be satisfactory to me.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Yes; I will be glad to do that later. Another item in which there is very material reduction is that of streets, on page 9 of the report. The committee recommends an appropriation of $491,000. The estimates for this purpose were $904,000. Now, in this we find for playgrounds, the purchase of sites, $186,000; for grading and improving Rosedale site, $5,000; for construction of bath houses and purchase of sites, $94,500; for drilling wells and maintenance of same, $5,000. These several items make up a very large per cent of the difference between the estimates and the recommendations by the committee. It will be remembered that last year the Congress gave $75,000 for the purchase of playground sites. It was then rumored on the floor of the House that there was a purpose in view to expend $1,000,000, at least, in the matter of playgrounds in the city. Many did not give credence to that rumor at the time, but here we have exceeding $200,000 in the estimates for this year in addition to what was given last year for this purpose. And if the estimates are borne out by the Congress, it will not be long until there is a million of dollars invested in playgrounds and playground sites and equipment in the city.

There is a very material saving also in the matter of corrections and charities of $310,000.

Mr. Chairman, how much time have I occupied?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has occupied twenty-eight minutes.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. I thank the Chair. I would like to know when I get within ten minutes of the time allotted, if I do not finish before.

In this item you will find that the estimates carried $100,000 for an additional building to the so-called "municipal hospital," for the purpose of caring for chronic patients. The committee believed that with the various and many hospitals in the city, with the new hospital building just completed out at the municipal plant, and which will release a number of wards now occupied by tuberculosis patients for other patients in the Washington Asylum Hospital, that it is not necessary to build that structure at this time. The same may be said in regard to the workhouse, an additional building recommended at $110,000. These two items alone take the major portion of the difference between the estimates and the amount recommended in the bill.

Now, I would like to recur to the point raised by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER], on page 12 of the report—Metropolitan police. There was, perhaps, no one thing to which the committee gave more careful consideration than this. As the gentleman from Indiana has well said, the press of the city has called attention to the inadequacy of the police force, to its failure to properly protect the people of the District, and to the necessity for a large increase of the force. It was because of that general public interest that the committee gave more than ordinary attention to this feature of the bill.

I want to say, Mr. Chairman, that I desire to present some figures along this line, in no sense to be construed as a reflection upon the police department of the city. We have no quarrel with that department whatever as to its administration; but it is due the House and due the committee to make a statement as to why the clamor of 100 additional policemen was not recognized in the bill. I may say at the outset that there were no additional policemen allowed, the bill carrying the same number as did the bill last year. The committee went carefully into an investigation as to the police in certain cities of relative size and in others having a corresponding colored population. It was contended that it was because of the large colored population that there were so many arrests, that the police were kept so active in the pursuit of their duties, and that the lawlessness of that element in the community required a larger force. We are not prepared to deny that there is something of truth in these declarations. On the other hand, the committee ascertained the cost of the police force in the city of Washington, as compared with other cities of its class, as well as the number of policemen in this city, compared with cities of like population. Among other things we found this: That Baltimore has a population of 508,000 people, that it has a police force of 701, that its police force costs the city of Baltimore $1.95 per capita. Washington, with a population of 278,000—these comparisons are all taken from the Census reports, 1900, and special reports obtained by the Census Department.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I would like to ask the gentleman if he claims that the population is only 278,000? When were the comparisons made?

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. They were all made in 1900, the last census; so that the basis of comparison is absolutely fair, you see. At the time these comparisons were made Washington had 278,000 population, with a police force of 467. It now has a force of 719. It cost the District of Columbia and the United States Government then $3.18 per capita, as against $1.95 in Baltimore. The nearest approach to the number of policemen in any city in the country, investigated and compared with Washington, was Buffalo with a population of 352,000, with a police force of 549 and a per capita cost of $2.14. But it must be remembered that Buffalo is one of the most important ports on the chain of the Great Lakes and has a large element in all of the sailing, and probably in the non-sailing, season that would be classed as turbulent people. We found again that Milwaukee, with 285,000 people, has 247 policemen and a cost per capita of $1.25.

Mr. PERKINS. May I ask the gentleman to what he attributes the very large increased cost per capita for the police in Washington as compared with the cities he has spoken of?

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. I think I will come to that a little later in the order of my statement.

Mr. PERKINS. I do not want to interrupt the order of the gentleman's statement.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. There has been much talk about the colored population. Memphis, 48 per cent colored; Washington 31 per cent. In Memphis they have, with 102,000 population, 76 policemen, at a cost to that city of $1.14 per capita, a small fraction more than a third as much as it costs the city of Washington. Atlanta has a population of 39 per cent colored as against Washington's 31. Atlanta, with 89,000 population, has a police force of 178 and a per capita cost of $1.78. Richmond has 38 per cent of its people colored. Its police force is 71, far less than Washington in proportion to population. Its cost is $1.34 per capita. Nashville, with a population of 80,000 and 37 per cent colored has a police force of 79—far less than Washington proportionately—and a cost per capita of $1.17.

Now, another thing. It is said that the police here are so vigilant in the matter of arrests. Richmond, with a population of 89,000, had 819 arrests per 10,000, as against Washington's 1,087. Atlanta, with its 178 policemen, had 1,674 arrests to every 10,000. Nashville, with its 79 policemen, made 1,226 arrests to every 10,000. Charleston, with 55,000 people, made 1,527 arrests, with a small force of police. Now, it does not fairly represent the police force of the city when it is said that the Metropolitan police covers the whole, nor does it fairly represent the police force if the impression were left on the minds of the committee that it has the use of the entire Metropolitan force. There are detailed in and about the White House and grounds 44 members of the Metropolitan police, reducing the force by that number. But over against that, the Government polices all its reservations in this city, this Capitol and its grounds, the Smithsonian Institution and its grounds, the Navy, War, and State Department building, and every other department in the city which is under national control, the Congressional Library, the parks, outside of Rock Creek Park, being policed by a force paid in part by the National Government. Now, in addition to that, the railroads police the crossings, wherever the Commissioners determine that policemen are necessary, and they pay for those police. Although these policemen are paid by the railroads, they are required to report to the superintendent of police and are under his direction, and if we did not have them the city would have to provide them.

Mr. AMES. You say the railroads. Do you mean the steam railroads?

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Yes; at their crossings.

Mr BONYNGE. Do the street railroads pay the policemen at their crossings?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Yes; that is what they complain of.

Mr GARDNER of Michigan. Mr. Smith informs me that the street railways likewise furnish crossings policemen.

Mr. LEAKE. I have noticed on the streets of Washington a number of very elderly gentlemen wearing the uniform of the Washington police, and wearing long flowing coats which look more like petticoats. Now, I want to know whether there is any age limit for the retirement of the police force?

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. I think on the Metropolitan police force there is, but on the street-crossing police, paid for by the railroads, I am inclined to think there is no age limit.

Mr. LEAKE. These policemen who are paid for by the railroads, do they come under the general supervision of the police department?

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. They are under the direction of the chief of police and report to him; so that the Government policemen and the railroad policemen more than make good the detail from the Metropolitan police at the White House and grounds.

Mr. TIRRELL. Can the gentleman tell us about what the average increase in population in Washington is yearly?

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. No; I am sorry to say I gave no attention to those statistics.

Mr. TIRRELL. I have heard it said that the annual increase is about five thousand. Can the gentleman also inform us as to the average number of new buildings that have gone up in Washington yearly during the last few years?

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. No; I can not tell you that, but the number is large.

Mr. TIRRELL. Does not the gentleman think that if there is that large annual increase, both in population and buildings, and if the number of policemen last year was requisite for the work and just about right, there should be some increase, though it may be small, each year?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Has the gentleman from Michigan admitted that we did not have too many last year?

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. There has been a material increase. I think there are on the force now 719 officers and privates in addition to reenforcement from the two sources to which I have referred.

Mr. TIRRELL. Now, one question more which it seems to me of great importance. Do not policemen in the city of Washington, on account of its large territory compared with the cities of Boston or Baltimore, have to cover a great deal more ground, or else not cover it at all, and therefore is it not necessary that there should be, on account of this being a city of magnificent distances, more policemen to cover that ground than would be necessary in either Baltimore or Boston?

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. I was coming to that and with it conclude my statement. It is due to the police force and to the Commissioners to say that the scope of their activities is as large as the District of Columbia, and that these outlying points are policed; they have a mounted police and a large force of bicycle policemen, the bicycle policemen, however, being used largely in the city. But when you grant all that it still remains that there is not a city in the United States that has the per capita police force that the city of Washington and the District of Columbia has at this time, nor is there one of its class that costs anything like as much per capita. The next largest is Buffalo, which is more than $1 less per capita in expense. The salaries are higher here, I can not tell you how much, but materially higher than elsewhere.

As will be brought out in the near future, the pension system has grown up to be a great tax upon somebody. Pensions on the force go as high as $100 a month. Widows get as high as $50 a month. Soldiers perforated with bullets get $30 a month. That gentleman's father [pointing to Representative AMES], a major-general in the Army, under the law is entitled to $30 a month if he wants it. A retired police officer who never fired a shot, or perhaps a shot was never fired at him, may draw $100 a month pension. The widow of a soldier dead on the battlefield gets $12 a month if the Sulloway bill becomes a law—as I hope it will—otherwise, she gets $8; but the wife of a dead policeman in Washington may get as high as $50 a month. Widows of the privates get from $20 to $30 per month. Those are some of the reasons why this great expense exists.

Mr. Chairman, I will reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman a question or two.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. How much time, Mr. Chairman, have I remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has twelve minutes.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. I would prefer that the gentleman would ask his questions under the five-minute rule when we reach those subjects.

Mr. NORRIS. Very well; I will postpone them until then.

Mr. BURLESON. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi thirty minutes, or so much of that time as he wants to occupy.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, I do not think I will need that length of time to curry this particular horse. This morning by a parliamentary device—I will not say by a parliamentary trick, because I want to be always courteous—the gentleman from Pennsylvania shut off the privilege of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DE ARMOND], and my privilege, as members of the Committee on Rules, of making any response at all to the statement which he made to the country of the present situation in the House, and that course of conduct followed after the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DE ARMOND] and I had given to the Committee on Rules a quorum to do business, when one Republican member of that committee was too ill to attend and the other two did not constitute a quorum.

Now, Mr. Chairman, some rather strong language has been indulged in, both by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] and the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE]. We have been held up as "filibusterers" before the country. The gentleman from Pennsylvania referred to our resorting to our constitutional right to call for the yeas and nays for the passage of measures through the House as "queer antics before the country."

Mr. Chairman, we have not filibustered. [Laughter on the Republican side.] We have broken no quorum, either in the House or in the Committee on Rules. And nobody is better aware of that fact than the two gentlemen who have used that language. A filibusterer in a parliamentary sense is a man that is engaged in the business of preventing legislation. We have been engaged in the business of trying to force legislation at the hands of the majority. [Applause on the Democratic side; laughter on the Republican side.] Nobody, no party, can filibuster when furnishing to the floor of the House its own proportion of a quorum. I doubt if all day yesterday and last night the Republican party had here, even if there had been added a sufficient number of Members on the Democratic side to call for the yeas and nays, a quorum in this House, and I know that this morning they had no quorum in the Committee on Rules, the very committee which reported out this rule. Do not understand me as complaining, Mr. Chairman; nor shall I apologize. The minority will exhaust every power it has under the general rules of this House. It will exhaust every power that it has under every special rule that you have the power to bring into this House to force out of you, if it can, legislation in the interests of the people. [Applause on the Democratic side.] So much in the interest of the people that your own chosen President has in several cases indorsed it, and so much in the interest of the people that your Committee on Ways and Mans and your Committee on Rules dare not permit the very measures we have in our programme stressed to come before this House for fear a majority of the Republican party in this House would adopt them. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

I am glad to see a few first fruits. I hear that an employers' liability bill has been finally reported out of the Judiciary Committee. I congratulate you gentlemen upon the Democratic side upon that fact. [Laughter on the Republican side.] That it might have been reported out at a later date is perhaps true, and that you on the Republican side would have been delighted to have kept it a while longer in committee as a buffer against other much needed and desired and beneficial legislation, also, I have no doubt; but the report of the employers' liability bill out of the Judiciary Committee is the first fruit, but only the first fruit, not the greatest. A new light, as a second fruit, has been shed, which in its effect upon man was never exceeded since Saul of Tarsus was turned into St. Paul on his way to Damascus. The Speaker of this House has seen the light. I see from this morning's paper that the Speaker does not propose to let the Republican Executive have a monopoly of criticising the Republican legislative part of this Government, but that he proposes, as spokesman and head of the legislative branch of the Republican Administration, to do a little criticising himself; this time, of the executive branch. Mr. Chairman, some time ago, in his message, the Executive read the riot act to the legislative part of the Republican party for failure to act and neglect of civic duty. I need not now dwell upon the various things to which he called attention, some of them good and some of them bad, because I have in a previous speech gone all over that.

I agreed with him in a part of his arraignment, and when, this morning or yesterday, by introduction of a resolution into this House, the Speaker of this House accuses the Republican executive department of failure to do its duty in stamping out a predatory trust, I agree also with the Speaker. I am proud of the fact that I can agree, when in their lucid intervals, with both branches of the Republican party. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.] The President was right when he said you had neglected your legislative duties in connection with the various measures to which he called your attention, some of which we hope, with his assistance, to corkscrew out of you before this Congress is over [applause on the Democratic side], and the Speaker was exactly right when he said that the executive department had neglected its duty when it had failed to make use of the evidence which the country possessed—perhaps already collected in the Department of Commerce and Labor—to prove the existence of a paper trust in this country and to put an end to the same.

Mr. Chairman, I read from this morning's Post, and I leave it to gentlemen to determine for themselves if this is not a conversion almost as great as that of Saul into St. Paul; the Speaker has introduced a resolution which reads as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of Commerce and Labor be directed, if not incompatible with the public service, to transmit to the House all papers and information which may be in the possession of the Department relating to any steps which may have been taken by the Bureau of Corporations to make the "diligent investigation into the organization, conduct, and management of the business of the International Paper Company of New York, and other corporations, joint stock companies, or combinations engaged in the manufacture of wood pulp or print paper, or the sale thereof, as said Bureau of Corporations is authorized to do by law of the United States, and all papers and information in his Department which are the result of such investigation, if any such has been made."

I read now from the article in the Washington Post of this morning:

Much significance is attached to the action of Speaker CANNON yesterday, in his capacity as a Member of the House, introducing a resolution directing the Department of Commerce and Labor to report to the House what investigation, if any, it has made into the business of the International Paper Company or other combination engaged in the manufacture of wood pulp and print papers, and also directing the Department of Justice to report what steps, if any, have been taken looking to the prosecution of these corporations for their alleged violations of the Sherman antitrust law.

The position of the author of these resolutions in the House of Representatives is sufficient guaranty that they will be promptly reported and adopted by the House. These resolutions also are important for the reason they indicate that Speaker CANNON holds to the view that the increase in the cost of print paper is due not so much to the protective tariff as it is to combinations in restraint of trade. Mr. CANNON evidently believes that if the Departments charged with the administration and enforcement of the antitrust law enforce it rigorously this combination can be put out of business, and the price of paper to the publishers, as a consequence, will be greatly reduced.

That is another so-called "Republican piece of proposed legislation" that I have the honor to announce that the Democratic side of this House will support to the full extent. The Democratic members of the committee will take pleasure in reporting out the Speaker's resolution, and the Democratic Members of this House will take pleasure in voting for it when it gets here.

Mr. Chairman, upon the other day the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] referred to the tactics that we were pursuing upon this side as "puerile" and "hypocritical." I have sometimes thought, and I say it in all good humor, that there is a large degree of comparison, although some degree of contrast, between my friend, the honorable SERENO E. PAYNE, of New York, and that distinguished knight of the days of Prince Hal who was known to his friends as Honest Jack Falstaff and to strangers as Sir John Falstaff. In breadth of girth there is much of comparison. They both "lard the lean earth" as they walk across it. In adopting Sir Jack's maxim that "discretion is the better part of valor," there is much of comparison, because the gentleman the other day, and generally indeed, manages to make the last speech when he is engaged in debate, whenever he can, so that he can not be easily and immediately replied to. Mr. Chairman, they are alike in this, too, that Prince Hal described Sir Jack as being "brave in coming on and halting in coming off" from the various enterprises which he undertook. In another part of Shakespeare's play Jack speaks of himself as being "not only witty in himself, but the cause of wit in others." [Laughter on the Democratic side.] So far as the latter part of this description—autobiographical description—of Sir Jack is concerned, the gentleman from New York resembles him closely. So far as the first paragraph of the description is concerned, it is with sincere regret and pain that I am compelled to say that there is a contrast and not a comparison, because whenever the gentleman from New York attempts to be "witty in himself" he is generally simply rude and awkwardly offensive.

It was not quite parliamentary to speak of the tactics which we were pursuing as "puerile" or "hypocritical." The gentleman should have selected some better word. However, the gentleman did not intend to be offensive in the slightest degree. He thought that he was being funny, and there is nothing funnier in the world than the gentleman from New York when he thinks he is being funny. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.] Now, Mr. Chairman, this morning the gentleman from Pennsylvania, who now occupies the chair, said the object of introducing this rule was to "expedite the public business." Mr. Chairman, the real object of introducing that rule was to prevent us from forcing you to expedite public business. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Every time anybody wants to pass any of this reform legislation, so much of which is desired by honest men in your own party, you cry out, "After the election! After the election! After the election!" You remind me a little bit of a piece of poetry my boy picked up the other day somewhere at the public school and brought home and recited to me and his grandmother, and of which, when he got through, his grandmother said, "Kit, you ought never to repeat that any more, because that is just about the same as telling anybody to go to the bad place." That poetry ran after this wise:

When I asked my girl to marry me, she said,
"Go to father."
She knew that I knew her father was dead;
She knew that I knew the life he had led;
She knew that I knew what she meant when she said,
"Go to father."

[Great applause and laughter.]

And you are going back to your people, you Republicans over there—I am not talking of those now who represent "stand-pat" districts of one sort and another—but, for example, gentlemen from Minnesota, one of whose laws was held up not long ago by a mere temporary restraining order of a subordinate court upon ex parte testimony, and some of you gentlemen who live in districts where the people want the tariff revised and do not want it revised by being told to "Go to father;" are you going back home and say to those people, "We were in favor of these things, but in voting against them, as we have done, we were merely following our leaders in the House of Representatives, and we are still going to do them 'after the election,'" I am afraid some of them will respond in the words of my mother-in-law and say, "Boy, do not say that any more; that sounds like telling me to wait until I go to the bad place." You have practiced this deception upon the American people so long that it would seem that "a fool who runneth" could now read it. Every time before an election you say to the people that you propose that "after the election" to do this, that, or the other thing, and then after the election you say, "The people have indorsed our not having done it, and the people stand with us on our inactivity." [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, this session when Mr. Herman Ridder on the outside and many people on the inside of Congress have urged this Congress to pass a bill putting wood pulp upon the free list and print paper there also, or at least to reduce the duty upon the latter, what has been the reply of the Republican leaders? They say, "We can not do it because if we bring a measure into the House putting wood pulp upon the free list, it will open up the whole tariff question, and the Democrats will make all sorts of amendments." I have finally succeeded in driving the majority to a demonstration of the falsity of that pretense, and I hold the demonstration in my hand as a palpable, legible, visible thing in the shape of the rule which you adopted this morning. It illustrates, it demonstrates, that you could by action of your Committee on Rules, under your peculiar general rules conferring the power which that committee has, bring into the House a bill, accompanied by a rule from the Committee on Rules and put that bill through, if you wanted it done, with three minutes' general debate and no time or opportunity for amendment under the five-minute rule at all. Bring in your rule! Let a special rule for once bring some benefit to the people. This whole country will know before this session is over that if remedial legislation can not be secured from this Congress, it will be because the minority under the general rules and under the special rule are as helpless for legislative purposes as a child shooting peas out of a muzzle-loaded shotgun at Gibraltar is impotent in an attempt to destroy the rock.

One thing we propose to demonstrate, and we are going to demonstrate it, is that we shall exhaust in our effort to obtain remedial legislation every power which the minority has under the rules. No man of honor or sense shall claim that we have failed to do that. This rule is "the first squeal," my Democratic friends, upon the Republican side. This rule is the first squeal from the other side, but it will not be the last. Talk about hypocrisy and puerility. What of the hypocrisy and puerility of this pretense that the majority in enacting desired legislation can not protect itself from the minority? They have more rules up their sleeves which they will bring in later, but as far as I am concerned I have enlisted for the war and I will stay with you here until the dog days. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Some of you think that you will intimidate or bribe members of the Democratic party by cutting men off from speeches that they want to make, because, of course, when I refuse you unanimous consent upon that side you will refuse it here, or by cutting them off from bills that they want to pass for their districts. I do not believe there is a man on this side of this Chamber ready to sell his fidelity to a general policy of substantive and beneficent legislation for the sake of a petty speech or a petty local bill. [Applause on the Democratic side.] If there be, I shall be much astonished.

I have heard that you have bruited it about that we should get nothing this session. Why, we are so in the habit of getting nothing and having nothing that it does not hurt us much. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Wherever one of us will be hurt one and a fraction of you will be injured, and we can stand it better than you can. Most of us who are upon this floor now are from districts where somebody may beat us for the nomination, but where no Republican is going to beat us at the election. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Even when a man sacrifices a seat, he sacrifices only himself; he does not sacrifice his party. But he will not by doing his duty here even sacrifice a nomination. The people will understand. It will be long before the dog days that you will be anxious, you Republicans, to be turning your way homeward to "mend your fences" and to take care of the live new Democrats with progressive spirits who are not letting any grass grow under their feet out West and in the Middle States. [Applause on the Democratic side.] You can not intimidate me, for one, with any special rules or with any threat of any rules. You might pass a general resolution in these words:

Resolved, That no motion or resolution or bill of the Hon. JOHN SHARP WILLIAMS, of Mississippi, shall be granted or become a law for nineteen months, or until the end of this Congress.

And you might bring in a special rule from the Rules Committee to put that resolution upon passage and pass it without amendment in ten minutes, and I might know beforehand that you were going to do it, and it would have just about as much effect upon me—oh, oh, well!—as the manner of the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] when he is on his feet making a speech. [Applause on the Democratic side.] And that is another respect in which he resembles Sir John Falstaff. He has a bullying verbality, or verbosity, whichever it may be, that does intimidate an ordinary, unaccustomed human being, and long ago it would have intimidated me, too, before I got used to the noise, but I have been standing in the hearing of it for fifteen years. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Chairman, when I was a boy, dressed in homemade clothes, made upon the plantation during the war out of wool off of our own sheep and cotton grown in our own field, spun and woven on our hand spindles and looms, when the war had just closed they were carrying me to Memphis to put me in school. I had never seen anything but a plantation and the things that grew upon a plantation—live stock and vegetables of various sorts. We finally got to a little town by the name of Grand Junction. I never knew why it was called "Grand," except, perhaps, that it was grand for that little particular place to be a junction at all. It was at that time populated by some 340 billy goats, some 4 saloons, and a few private residences. It also had one of those old-fashioned eating hotels where the railroad trains stopped for meals. You had to get off there in order to change cars for Memphis. While we were waiting the most unearthly noise I ever heard in all my life broke out upon my ears. Out in front of the piazza of the hotel the railroad tracks were running parallel and crisscrossing, the switch engines were going up and down, but I could not stand that noise behind me, and I made right out in front of the hotel. My old nurse Lucy took after me, caught me after a while amidst the railroad tracks and not far from some of the locomotives, and said, "My God, Mars Johnny, what is the matter with you?" I said, "Why, Lucy, didn't you hear that noise? Judgment day is coming. Everything is going to pieces." "Why," she said, "Mars Johnny, that ain't nothin' but a new-fangled dinner horn." I afterwards found out it was a Chinese gong. It was the first one I had ever gotten acquainted with, but not the last, whether mechanical or human.

Since that time I have never been intimidated by mere swell of breast or rotundity of sound nor by mere—oh, I do not like to say, because I know it is unconscious; it is not intended; I would not like to say insolence of manner. Shall I say, unconscious arrogation of superiority to common mortals? I would not like to say that either, because I think that even is unconscious, a mere oozing out at the pores, like Bob Acres's courage. I shall call it the absolute unpreventability of manner and voice of the gentleman from New York. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Now, you brought in a rule here, Mr. Chairman, and this rule reads that "the first reading of this bill shall be dispensed with; that after two hours' of general debate, the time to be equally divided," etc., a vote is to be taken. The other day you made an agreement in this House for eight hours upon this special bill. Now, by this rule you say two hours, not eight. The Chair very correctly ruled this morning. Of course the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DE ARMOND] was merely trying to show the lack of moral conduct, the lack of ethics, on the Republican situation when he made the point of order. That you have the legal power, under a rule or without a rule, by a majority vote to break an agreement there is no doubt. You have the power to pass one thing in Congress one day and repeal it the next day, for that matter; but we have driven you to where you are not only changing your rules to suit your hand, but where you break your plighted word. [Applause on the Democratic side.] That you have the legal right to do it nobody doubts, nobody anywhere. But to repeal a law is one thing and to repeal an agreement amongst men is another thing. [Renewed applause on the Democratic side.]

To take advantage of your power as lawmakers to get out of the attitude of an agreement between one another as men is a totally different thing. However, I do not want to dwell upon that; neither will you hereafter.

Now, a few words to this—the Democratic—side of the House and I shall conclude. We have not much power. The gentleman from New York has taken the trouble to tell us that this Congress would be run without any reference to us by that side of the Chamber. We have, however, some rights. One of them is a right inherent to each Member on this side to object to unanimous consent. It causes some inconvenience. Another is a right luckily secured by the Constitution itself and not destructible by the Committee on Rules, to call for the yeas and nays upon every affirmative proposition of legislation that passes through the House. Then we have some power in a different way. Whenever you dare—whenever you dare let the House consider any of these special bills to which I have referred, we have the power of adding ourselves as a minority to a fraction of the majority and thereby to make a majority of this House. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

I have not very much hope that an opportunity will present itself to exercise that power and to show our utility to the country in that respect, because if there ever was anybody—and

I say it, as you all know, with all due regard and affection, for I have a feeling toward him almost like a son who has been kindly treated has toward his father or uncle—but if there ever was a man bestriding a situation of which he was afraid, and so much afraid that he fully deserved to be named after an Indian chief out in the West, "Old-Man-Afraid-of-His-Horses" [laughter on the Democratic side], that man is the present Speaker of this House at this moment. [Renewed laughter and applause.] There is nobody bestriding anything worse afraid of what he is bestriding at this time unless it be the Hon. SERENO PAYNE, chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means. [Renewed applause on the Democratic side.] Luckily for him, however——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, I thank the House for its attention, and shall sit down.

Mr. BURLESON. I can yield the gentleman further time.

Mr. RANSDELL of Louisiana. I will yield the gentleman part of my time.

Mr. WILLIAMS. What I have said is enough.

Mr. BURLESON. I yield thirty minutes to the gentleman from Louisiana.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Louisiana is recognized for thirty minutes.

Mr. RANSDELL of Louisiana. Mr. Chairman and Gentlemen of the Committee, I propose to discuss one of the most important questions confronting the nation, to wit, that of transportation as affected by the proper improvement of our waterways. Every citizen is interested in cheap transportation because it enters into the daily life of everyone; it affects the food we eat, the clothes we put on, our movements from place to place. The more enlightened and civilized a nation, the more perfect its methods of transportation.

Waterways from the earliest days were the best means of transportation till the advent and development of railroads about eighty years ago, and they are still the cheapest of all known methods. Nearly 60,000,000 tons of freight were carried through the locks on the St. Marys River, connecting lakes Huron and Superior, last year at a freight charge of about .84 of 1 mill per ton per mile, which is about one-ninth of the average railroad rate of 7.48 mills per ton per mile, and water rates on the Ohio and lower Mississippi are about the same as on the Great Lakes. Had the total commerce of the Lakes last year, amounting to about 80,000,000 tons, been carried by rail at the average railroad rates of the entire Union the charges thereon would have exceeded by over $300,000,000 the amounts actually paid for freight. Hence, the improvements on the Lakes, which have cost about $70,000,000, saved last year to the American people more than four times as much as their total cost, and they will continue to save as much and more annually for all time to come.

While actual statistics are not obtainable for all our waterways, I am convinced that water transportation costs only about one-sixth as much as the average cost by rail.

Moreover, in many cases delivery by water is much quicker for heavy, bulky, low-class commodities. Railroad freight cars moved in 1906 an average of only 25 miles in twenty-four hours, and, I believe, an elaborate study would show that boats moved at least 100 miles in the same time.

Railroads are very limited in capacity, and there was fierce congestion on them not many months ago. On well-improved waters, such as Long Island Sound, the Great Lakes, and the Hudson and lower Mississippi Rivers, there is practically no limit to the volume of business that may be carried thereon and no danger of congestion.

Railroads are monopolistic corporations, owned, operated, and controlled for private gain. Competition over any given line is impossible, because the roadbed belongs to the corporation. Waterways are free roadbeds, for the use and enjoyment of all the people. Conditions for competition are perfect on them, and they can never be monopolized. No rate commission is needed to fix freight rates on improved water courses.

Most of the great annual expenditures of our Government are like the rain falling on the parched sands of the desert, only to disappear and leave no trace behind. But waterway improvements are investments which will last forever. The eight millions expended in giving a 35-foot channel to Boston Harbor cheapens ocean rates fully 100 per cent to the grain grower of the West and the cotton producer of the South. The annual saving in freight rates exceeds the total cost of the project, and it will remain a lasting benefit to hundreds of generations of Americans for thousands of years after the Dreadnoughts of to-day have decayed into their original elements and been forgotten.

The United States leads the world in many things. In railroads we are far ahead of any other country, but in waterway improvements we are way behind our Canadian neighbors and several European nations. No country on earth is better supplied by nature with waterways than ours, and though they have been sadly neglected in the past, I pray, in the words of Washington, uttered with prophetic wisdom one hundred and twenty years ago, "Would to God we may have the wisdom to improve them."

To sum up this branch of my subject, permit me to say that we should improve our waterways:

First. Because water transportation is much cheaper than by rail, and in many cases much quicker for the heavy, low-class commodities. On well-improved lakes and rivers the cost of transportation is about one-sixth of the average cost by rail.

Second. Because the railroads are congested and unable to handle the commerce of the country. Experts assert that during the past ten years production has increased 126 per cent and railroad facilities for handling it only 22 per cent. Improved waterways would relieve this congestion very materially, if not entirely, and would also furnish healthy competition with resultant cheapening of railroad rates.

Third. Because our commercial competitors—Germany and France—have have so thoroughly developed and improved their waterways and cheapened freight charges that we will be unable to compete with them in the world's markets unless we do likewise.

Fourth. Because Canada now has a 14-foot canal connecting the Great Lakes with the ocean, and is planning a 21-foot canal through Georgian Bay and the Ottawa River, and we must make as good connections with the sea or the commercial supremacy of our great ports is liable to pass to a Canadian city.

Fifth. Because we are spending vast sums at Panama to connect two oceans by a canal 35 feet deep, and make the greatest artificial waterway on earth, and in order to reap its full benefits our rivers must be so improved as to get our commerce to the sea quickly at the lowest rates, and our harbors so deepened that any ship passing through that canal may enter any one of the important harbors on our seaboard.

Sixth. Because waterway improvements are as imperishable as the solid rock and concrete out of which they are constructed. They are permanent investments, returning to the nation every year and for all time a large dividend upon their cost.

Mr. Chairman, this question of waterway improvements has come very prominently before the American people within the past few years. It has been discussed perhaps as much as any other question. It is entirely a nonpolitical one, and I wish to say in advance that I do not intend to treat it along political lines. I wish to point out its importance as a business matter. I wish to suggest to this Congress some constructive business legislation which, in my judgment, sir, we should adopt at this time, and which we will make a serious mistake if we do not pass at this session.

On the 7th of last month I had the honor to introduce in this House a bill to create a new Executive Department, to be known as the "Department of Transportation and Public Works," and whose head shall be a member of the Cabinet. Lack of time prevents me from discussing this bill fully, but I will say, in brief, that it proposes to place under one Department all Federal matters relating in any way to transportation by highways, railways, and waterways, and to such public works of every kind and sort as require the intervention and services of skilled civilian engineers. It would include everything relating to public buildings and grounds, public roads, the Geological Survey, the Reclamation Service, the Coast and Geodetic Survey, the surveys of public lands, a bureau of transportation, with important powers in regard to rail and water terminals and the administrative functions now exercised by the Interstate Commerce Commission, a bureau of waterways, with all powers now delegated to the Engineer Corps of the Army, and many additional powers, and also bureaus of mining, of standards, and coordination.

You will observe that while the scope of the proposed Department is very broad, everything in it is closely allied, either because it relates to transportation or is a branch of the great science of civil engineering. I invite your careful consideration and criticism of this bill as a whole, but for the present must address myself to its waterway features.

The term "civilian engineer" is used in contrast with the engineers of the War Department, who now have charge of all Government works on the waterways of this country, and I wish to say that in my judgment we will never make a great success in improving these waterways until we take them entirely out of the hands of the war engineers. They are trained for war, not for water, and we must have men thoroughly educated in hydraulics, or water engineering, rather than in the science of war, if we expect to get the best results.

Now, gentlemen, I have the highest regard and esteem for the splendid Engineer Corps of the Army. I do not believe there is a better branch of the public service than these engineers. I do not believe there is a branch which has rendered more faithful, more honorable, more honest, and more painstaking service than they have. I am not criticising them in the least, for they have done their best with the opportunities given them; but I am undertaking to criticise the American Congress, which has thrown upon these engineers the task of carrying on works of improvement on waterways under a most unbusinesslike and inadequate system, from which it was impossible to secure good results—indeed, under a nondescript method of nonaccomplishment, which is absolutely unworthy the name of system.

What is that method? Why, sirs, when any particular waterway is to be improved in any part of the country, its friends come to Congress and ask an order directing the Engineer Corps to make a survey of it. A bill is then passed commanding that it be done under carefully specified limitations, and under that order the engineers make the survey. If everything is favorable and the report satisfactory, Congress may adopt the project and appropriate part of the money necessary for it. The next, or some succeeding Congress, may fail to make appropriations, or some ambitious politician or engineer may bring about a change of plan, and the net result in most cases is interminable delay, with complete failure in many.

There has never yet been any well-defined, comprehensive plan or policy for the improvement of our waters as a whole. The engineers ordered, for instance, to survey the Ohio River with a view of obtaining 9 feet from Pittsburg to Cairo have no power whatsoever to investigate the mighty Missouri, the upper Mississippi, the Illinois, the Tennessee, the Cumberland, the Arkansas, the Yazoo, the Ouachita, or any other of the various rivers of the great Mississippi system, all of which should form part of one comprehensive whole. Why, sirs, when a railroad car is loaded at my home in Lake Providence, La., it can go on a standard-gauge railroad to Boston, to Portland, to Chicago, or to any part of the Union. Now, if we require standards in railroads, we should have standards, or at least as near an approximation to standards as possible, in our waterways. But under our system the engineers have no right to make a general investigation, no right to work out a comprehensive plan, and no right to make recommendations in regard to anything except the one specific project submitted to them. They are mere automatons, mere machine surveyors, ordered by Congress to do thus and so, and their training at West Point as military men compels them to obey orders and do what they are told—no more and no less.

I should like to see a radical change in this matter. I should like to see the Department of Transportation and Public Works created, and in it a Bureau of Waterways, presided over by the greatest hydraulic engineer in the Union, to be called the "Commissioner of Waterways," aided and assisted by a number of high-class civilian engineers. I should like to see sufficient money given to this commissioner so that he might work out through the disconnected surveys already made and new surveys, and so forth, a broad, comprehensive, far-reaching plan for improving every waterway in the country along the seaboard, with its innumerable harbors and intercoastal waters, on the Great Lakes, and every river and connecting canal that is capable of being improved within reasonable cost and that seems to be justified by the present or prospective needs of commerce. [Applause.] When this plan is worked out it should be reported to Congress, and if adopted, in whole or in part, the execution should be committed to the commissioner and ample funds provided for the completion within the next ten years of all such projects as Congress approves.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RANSDELL of Louisiana. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I have been following the gentleman's speech closely, for I realize that no Member of the House has given more earnest and enthusiastic study to this great question than he has. I realize, too, that the delay in carrying on the river and harbor work has been very exasperating, in view of the existing demands of commerce. But it has seemed to me that the members of the Engineer Corps of the Army have done magnificent work and that the handicap has been, perhaps, from the fact that there has been such a small force. I would like to ask the gentleman if he does not think that he could accomplish what he wants by a large increase in the engineer force?

Mr. RANSDELL of Louisiana. I agree with your statement that our Army Engineer Corps have done magnificent work, and no man gives them higher credit than I, but I do not believe we can cure the disease by increasing their number. The trouble goes deeper than that. We must go to the root of the system. The United States Army engineers are not trained in hydraulics. The ten honor men of the graduating class at West Point, if I am correctly informed, are selected annually and placed in the Engineer Corps. These young engineers, fresh from college, after a brief sojourn in the Army, are then sent out to some work—for instance, on the Mississippi River, where they study the terrible flood, and the levees and caving banks of that great stream—and are kept there from one to three years. Thence they may go to the mouth of the Columbia, where the enormous waves of the Pacific, constantly pouring into that river and meeting its currents and shifting sands, present problems entirely different from those on the Mississippi. After one or two years on the Columbia, they are sent, perhaps, to your own great harbor at Boston, where the problems in rock dredging for the 35-foot channel secured by your efforts are very different from those on the Mississippi and the Columbia rivers. They work with the greatest diligence, as everyone does in Boston, and after two or three years are beginning to get a little understanding of their task when an order comes sending them to Chicago, Detroit, or Cleveland, where they are kept about the same time wrestling with the intricate and difficult problems of the Great Lakes. They then go to Savannah or New Orleans and build jetties to wash the sand off the bars at the mouths of the Mississippi and Savannah rivers under plans devised by the great civil engineer, James B. Eads. From there perchance they are sent to Yellowstone Park to build good roads in that grand playground of America. Then to the Philippines to construct railroads and military roads, at which they are busied for one or two years. Then back to San Francisco, where they build fortifications at the "Golden Gate." Then to Panama to make the great canal. And finally they are moved into active service with the Army, the real business for which they were educated and trained. And in not a single one of these positions, except the Army and fortification work, are they kept long enough to master the problems.

One of our ablest civilian engineers says that it would take the finest kind of an engineer fully fifteen or twenty years to master the problems on most any of our great rivers. I wish to say, after having lived on the banks of the Mississippi for twenty-six years, constantly studying it, and being somewhat of an embryo engineer myself, I do not believe there is a man living who can completely master all the problems of that great river in less than twenty years; and yet these gentlemen of the Army are expected to learn them in two or three years.

I repeat that we must get at the root of this system. If our main purpose in using Army engineers for works on waterways be to give them a broad, liberal education which will be of vast benefit in their military career, the present system is a bonanza, but if we seek the best interests of waterways and of commerce it is a lemon.

Replying further to your question, Mr. LAWRENCE: On the 28th of last month there were 175 members in the Engineer Corps, and the law authorizes a total of 188. Undoubtedly a large increase in the Corps would ultimately be of some help. They were distributed for duty as follows:

River and harbor, exclusively	24
River and harbor and other duties	36
Total river and harbor	60
Panama Canal	8
Insular possessions, including Cuba	28
Office Chief of Engineers	6
With troops in the United States	38
Light-House Establishment, exclusively	2
Public Buildings and Grounds, District of Columbia	2
District government	3
General Staff	1
Fortification work, exclusively	1
Survey of the Northern and Northwestern lakes	1
United States Military Academy	8
Army School of the Line, as instructors	2
In General Hospital	2
On leave of absence	4
On graduating leave of absence	9
Total	175

In my judgment, sirs, we should adopt the excellent plan followed by Germany and France. These wise nations have great schools where they train their engineers in hydraulics and other branches of civil engineering. All their public works of every kind relating to wharves, docks, waterways, canals, roads, railroads, and so forth, are placed in the hands of these skilled civilians, who devote their whole lives to the task. Army engineers are not employed in civil works in either France or Germany. Nor do the Canadians use army engineers in improving their great waterways. And every student knows that these three countries are far ahead of the United States in the development and beneficial use of their waters.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RANSDELL of Louisiana. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Is not one of the difficulties this: That an engineer of the Army is assigned to a project and before it is completed he is removed and put in charge of some other work, another being assigned to this project, who frequently disagrees with the ideas of the engineer who preceded him?

Mr. RANSDELL of Louisiana. Yes, that is literally true; and it sometimes results disastrously, nearly always produces great delay, and occasionally defeats the project.

To illustrate very briefly our unbusinesslike methods: We began to improve the Ohio River over twenty-five years ago so as to get a minimum low-water depth of 6 feet from Pittsburg to Cairo. Nineteen engineers of the corps have expended the sums which Congress doled out in the triennial river and harbor bills, and after the lapse of a quarter of a century of effort less than one-tenth of the work is finished. A recent survey of the river recommends 9 feet instead of 6, and the additional cost is estimated at $63,000,000. If old methods are followed, this 9-foot scheme will be on the boards for over a hundred years. A complete and radical change is necessary. Before leaving this topic, I wish to say, in justice to the engineers, that the fault on the Ohio lies entirely with Congress and its parsimonious appropriations—not with the engineers, who spent all that was given them.

Some of my Democratic colleagues have objected to my bill, because, as they say, we have too many executive departments now. It is well for us to look around and see what the balance of the world is doing in this respect. If there be real need for a Department of Transportation and Public Works, and if we can find strong precedent for it in other advanced countries, certainly there is no reason why we should not have it. [Applause.] Especially is that true if we find abroad more members in these departments than nine, which is the number in our Cabinet. In Great Britain there are nineteen members of the cabinet; in Canada, eleven, one of whom is the minister of public works; in Argentine Republic, eight, one of whom is minister of public works; in France, a Republic just like ours, eleven, one of whom is minister of public works; in Japan, nine, one of whom is minister of communications; in Mexico, eight, one of whom is minister of communications and public works; in the Netherlands, nine, one of whom is minister of public works; and in Russia, fourteen, one of whom is minister of ways and communications, so there is plenty of precedent for us. If we wish to add a member to our Cabinet we can find precedent both for the increase and for the creation of a Department of Public Works.

Now, Mr. Chairman, this matter of improving our waterways has been called to the attention of the country most persistently during the last two or three years, and no man has done it more forcefully and intelligently than the President of the United States. In three messages to this Congress he has called particular attention to the necessity of adopting a waterway policy at this session, the necessity of changing our policy now. Just as he wants other legislation now, he wants waterway legislation now. Let me read a few of his utterances.

In his annual message on December 3 last, Mr. Roosevelt said:

> Our great river systems should be developed as national water highways. The National Government should undertake this work, and I hope a beginning will be made in the present Congress. The work should be systematically and continuously carried forward in accordance with some well-conceived plan.

Those words have a familiar sound. The national Democratic platform of 1904 contained the first strong declaration in favor of waterway improvements ever adopted by a national party. It reads:

> We favor liberal appropriations for the care and improvement of the waterways of the country. When any waterway like the Mississippi River is of sufficient importance to demand special aid of the Government, such aid should be extended with a definite plan of continuous work until permanent improvement is secured.

Now, Mr. Chairman, do not you think the President must have had before him when he penned his December message that wellspring of patriotic wisdom and statesmanship—the national Democratic platform of 1904? [Applause on the Democratic side.] I think so, because the words and ideas are so similar.

On February 26 last, when transmitting to Congress the preliminary report of the Inland Waterways Commission, the President said:

> Our people are united in support of the immediate adoption of a progressive policy of inland waterway development. Hitherto the national policy of inland waterway development has been largely negative. No single agency has been responsible under Congress for making the best use of our rivers or for enforcing foresight in their development.

My friends, let me emphasize that proposition. No single agency has ever been responsible for our waterways. They have been in all of our history a mere incident, a side issue with one bureau—the Engineer Corps of the War Department—a Department which has nothing in common with waterways, only a side issue, with one bureau, in a Department which pays no attention whatsoever to commerce instead of being the main issue in one devoted to transportation and civil works.

Mr. BEDE. And do not have half of that bureau?

Mr. RANSDELL of Louisiana. And not half of that bureau. I thank the gentleman for the suggestion; only a small part of the engineer bureau.

The President continues:

> Frequent changes of plan and piecemeal execution of projects have still further hampered improvements.

Just as my friend Mr. HUMPHREYS suggested.

> The first condition of successful development of our waterways is a definite and progressive policy. The second is a concrete general plan, prepared by the best experts available, covering every use to which our streams can be put. We shall not succeed until the responsibility for administering the policy and executing and extending the plans is definitely laid on one man or group of men who can be held accountable.

That is what my bill proposes to do; to place this power in the hand of one man and one group of men, who can be held accountable.

> Adequate funds should be provided, by bond issue, if necessary, and the work should be delayed no longer. The development of our waterways and the conservation of our forests are the two most pressing physical needs of the country. They are interdependent, and they should be met vigorously, together and at once.

These are strong, wise words. Would to heaven Congress would hearken to them at once!

Only a few days ago, in a special message sent us on the 25th day of March, he says:

> Ample provision should be made for a permanent waterways commission, with whatever power is required to make it effective. The reasonable expectation of the people will not be met unless the Congress provides at this session for the beginning and prosecution of the actual work of waterway improvement and control.

Now, in line with that last message, gentlemen of the committee, permit me to say that I heartily favor the creation of an Inland Waterways Commission as suggested by the President, but I do not favor giving them any power at this time except that of investigation and recommendation, so that they may advise Congress in regard to the best methods of handling this troublesome question. I think this Commission should visit the old countries of the earth and such parts of North and South America as have taken advanced stands in water improvements. I think they should get the benefit of all the world's lore in regard to this most important business matter, and after a thorough, painstaking investigation they should transmit their findings and recommendations to Congress. With the assistance and advice of this commission of scientists and experts Congress could determine upon a "definite and progressive policy" to be executed under "a concrete general plan," and when that is done, the Department I propose, through its Waterway Bureau, could carry out our statutes on the subject. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, on the 4th, 5th, and 6th of last December a great waterways convention was held in this city by the National Rivers and Harbors Congress. Nearly 2,000 delegates were accredited to it, and there were representatives from thirty-seven States of this Union. That convention voiced the opinion of the American people when it declared in favor of a "wise, liberal, and comprehensive waterway policy that will provide for the proper improvement within the next ten years of the rivers, waterways, and harbors of our country the improvement of which is justified by the present and prospective benefits to commerce;" when it asked Congress to view river and harbor appropriations as "an investment in permanent improvements bound to pay increasing dividends from year to year;" when it urged annual appropriations of "not less than $50,000,000" for waterways, and promised its support to a "bond issue, similar in character to that for building the Panama Canal, if same be found necessary." [Loud applause.] It gave expression to the idea dominant in the business world of America that water transportation is essential to our commercial prosperity and that it should be developed to the utmost without delay.

The proceedings of this convention met with unanimous approval from the press in every part of the country, and no dissenting voice has been heard. The brief time allowed me permits only a few short quotations, though I have editorial indorsement from over a hundred leading papers.

In the Evening Star, of this city, an editorial in its issue of December 5, 1907, while the convention was in session, says:

The present movement, which is both nonsectional and nonpartisan—national in the truest sense—deserves success. It is in accord with what may be characterized as a general awakening to great national needs, hitherto but imperfectly appraised or else entirely neglected. Our waterways are an asset of incalculable value, and by the proper care may be made to solve many difficulties in the problem of transportation, and every member of either House of Congress can well afford to give his voice and vote for a comprehensive policy of permanent improvement.

It is not a matter of a few years or a few millions. A study of the map shows both the extent and the importance of the undertaking. The larger rivers are long, the smaller crooked. All will call for a liberal outlay if what is in view is to be accomplished. For this reason the greatest importance attaches, as Mr. Root points out, to what is now on the cards. A beginning means a carrying forward of work, and money will be wasted if the beginning is not wisely made. As the Secretary puts it, a policy, not a project, confronts us.

In the Philadelphia Inquirer of December 6, I find:

There must be a fixed plan. There must be a definite sum set aside not spasmodically, but annually. * * *

Fifty millions a year for the next ten years—this is one of the objects aimed at by the great conference of delegates at Washington. * * *

A regular plan and fifty millions a year as a positive fixture—that is a policy which Congress must adopt if it is to consider, first of all, the vital interests of the country.

The Times-Democrat, of New Orleans, La., on December 7, speaks as follows:

Will Congress declare for a definite waterway improvement policy, backing up its declaration of faith with adequate monetary support, or will it refuse the request in which practically the entire nation has joined?

No great public movement was ever more strongly backed by national sentiment. The waterways propaganda has progressed steadily for years. Half measures and patchwork policies have been found expensive and profitless. The belief in the absolute necessity of comprehensive and systematic improvement has been forced upon us by natural and commercial conditions. Even in the ranks of the obstructionists there is hardly a man who will not admit the national need of enlarged waterways. In the demand put forward by the Rivers and Harbors Congress there is neither politics nor sectionalism. Prominent Democrats and leading Republicans are united in its support. Resistence to the movement can not be justified upon grounds of political expediency, and even less by the plea of economy, for the improved waterways system will of itself work economies upon the grand scale. Congress can not dodge the issue. It must give a direct answer to the appeal, and its speech must be "yea, yea," or "nay, nay."

On December 8 the Chicago Inter-Ocean gave its indorsement:

The Rivers and Harbors Convention, the largest and most representative gathering ever held to discuss the subject, at its meeting in Washington last week requested Congress to make a standing or permanent appropriation of $50,000,000 a year for the improvement of the nation's waterways. * * *

The nation's growth has compelled the taking of new thought about the rivers. The nation's production and trade have outgrown railway capacity. Money might be found to build more railways, but it is being seen ever more clearly that the railways can never adequately take the place of the waterway.

No wit of man can make the car as cheap a carrier as the boat. Where rapid transit is not essential, as with the vast bulk of freight it is not, the waterway is superior.

In the News, of Cleveland, Ohio, on January 6 are these strong words:

Waterways cheapen transportation by both water and rail. Cheap transportation is as essential to industry as it is to successful agriculture. There is not one square mile of territory in America whose interests can be absolutely divorced from the waterways problem. The country has, in the Great Lakes, the Mississippi, and other great water courses, the making of the finest system of internal waterways in the world. The future of the country requires that the work go forward.

Let Congress feel that the people demand it.

And in the Philadelphia Inquirer of March 20 is this stinging rebuke to our inaction:

A few cheeseparers and pullbacks in Washington, assuming to be leaders, are possessed with the idea that it is good politics to hold up every possible improvement and thus make a showing of economy. It is a miserly and altogether detestable trick which will not fool anyone. The people are ready to indorse the development of waterways and they look to Congress to start the ball a-rolling.

We believe with Senator KNOX that there is nothing before the country of greater importance than the opening up of these new transportation routes. They mean cheaper rates for all of the people.

But Congress loiters and hesitates. Why?

There is not a single Member from any State in the Union who can give a satisfactory answer.

In addition to the President's messages, the actions of the Rivers and Harbors Congress and many similar waterway conventions, the universal demand of the commercial world, even including railroads, and the united press, we have all the candidates for President clamoring for waterway improvements. Mr. KNOX delivered a speech at Pittsburg recently which is one of the most notable contributions to this subject. Mr. Taft's Ohio platform, adopted March 4, has a very strong waterway plank, and so has the platform of Mr. Bryan at Omaha, March 6. Governor Johnson was one of the star speakers at the Rivers and Harbors Congress. "Uncle Joe" and Mr. FAIRBANKS expressed hearty approval of that convention's resolutions. Mr. Hughes is also a believer. I have not heard from FORAKER and LA FOLLETTE, but have no doubt they are both on the waterway wagon. And there is not a single Member of Congress who dares or wishes to raise his voice in opposition.

What, then, is the trouble, and why do we delay? Do not fool yourselves into believing the country will excuse you because of a probable deficit in the Treasury. It does not require much cash to inaugurate great engineering works, as they progress very slowly, but you should authorize them and let the good work begin; then, if funds are not available in the future, as the work proceeds, bonds may be issued, as in the Panama Canal. I am no advocate of bonds if we can get along without them, but I cheerfully voted authority to the President to issue bonds for the Panama Canal when necessary, and being convinced that the improvement of our internal waterways would benefit us much more than that canal ever will, I will vote bonds for waterways if they can be improved in no other way.

Do not be misled, either, by the statement that there are large unexpended sums on hand for our waterways out of past appropriations and we need no more till those amounts are expended. It is true that most of the money appropriated and authorized in our bill of last year is still unspent, because it takes a long time in many instances to get ready, as, for example, the new lock at Sault Ste. Marie and the new channel on the Detroit River, for which we gave some thirteen millions in the last bill. But it is certain that work can not begin until the project is adopted and authorized by Congress.

Some most meritorious and expensive projects are now ready for Congressional action which were not in shape last year, as, for example, the Ohio River, which will cost over $63,000,000. The report on this project was submitted to Congress on the 13th of last February, and it is very strongly urged by all the engineers connected with it. That gigantic project, which is of interest to the entire country, should be delayed no longer, but it should be adopted at this session and work begun at once. At least six and a half millions should be appropriated or authorized for it now, and Congress should commit itself definitely to a similar sum every year until it is completed. We hope to complete the Panama Canal in ten years from its beginning; surely the Ohio River, if worthy of improvement, as all admit, should not require more time for competition than that great canal.

I use the Ohio merely as an illustration. There are many other waters of great merit, including that grand conception which has the hearty indorsement of the President—a 14-foot channel from the Lakes to the Gulf, on which appropriations could be most wisely made at this session.

Moreover, there are some prospective projects of the first magnitude, such as the Atlantic coast inland waterway from Boston to Florida, on which nothing can be done until surveys and estimates are made. Our friends along the coast will be deeply disappointed if we do not pass a bill and give them the desired survey. Such a survey will take much time—probably two or more years. If we have no bill till next year, and then order a survey, it will probably be three years from now before their claims can be presented for action by Congress. This is an unreasonable and unwise delay. I know nothing of the merits of this proposed intercoastal canal except in the most general way, but if it is half as good as its friends claim it to be, we ought to be in position to act on it as soon as possible.

By all means let us have river and harbor legislation at this session. I beg of you to consider the gravity of this situation, and implore you not to let the session pass without legislation looking to a broad, comprehensive plan for improving all of our waterways.

Mr. Chairman and gentleman, permit me to suggest that this question is up to you, and you must solve it or be held accountable. Like Banquo's ghost, it will not down, but must be settled, or at least placed in the process of adjustment at this session of Congress. You can not delay it or dodge it. You must say "yea, yea," or "nay, nay!" [Loud applause.]

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. How much time remains on the other side?

The CHAIRMAN. No time remains on the other side, and ten minutes remain to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, I yield the remaining time to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BANNON].

Mr. BANNON. Mr. Chairman, the leading article in The Saturday Evening Post of March 21 is entitled "The Undiscussed Issue." The article purports to discuss the protective tariff.

The author of it is Will Payne, but he certainly is not a regular subscriber to the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, or he would not have indulged in such a misnomer. It is possibly needless to say that he has no connection with the Committee on Ways and Means or its distinguished chairman. The Saturday Evening Post is a great journal. Its circulation must be enormous. You meet it everywhere. You find it at every railway station, on all trains, in every hotel, in every village. It goes to the homes of the people. Its contributors are interesting writers, and it occupies a position in this country as a publication which gives standing and character to its utterances. For this very reason any statement of fact made by it from which conclusions are drawn should be most accurate. Otherwise, the reader is misled. In the article I just referred to are many glaring inaccuracies, to which attention should be drawn, lest they be accepted as facts. I will read a paragraph from that article:

Massachusetts leads the United States in production of manufactured goods per capita. There is a protective duty of 25 per cent on boots; but there is another of 20 per cent on sole leather and 15 per cent on hides—the raw materials. There is a leather trust which is an adjunct of the beef trust, and somebody complains that the hide duty puts $1 into the United States Treasury and $4 into the fat coffers of the beef trust.

Massachusetts manufacturers have a machine with which one man sews 250 pairs of shoes in a day; another which enables a single operative, at one stage, to handle 300 pairs daily, against 5 pairs by hand. Some of the manufacturers have concluded, therefore, that with free hides they would take their chances against the pauper labor of Europe. They might then get a chance at the export trade which they are now completely shut out of. Of all manufactures of leather we export $50,000 worth a year; of leather itself and all its manufactures about a hundred thousand dollars' worth, while of leather and its manufactures we import from fifteen to twenty million dollars' worth a year, all paying duty. Last year our imports of hides (dutiable) rose to 135,000,000 pounds. The domestic producer of leather, having erected the tariff fence, can not meet the demand.

The shoe manufacturer, paying 15 per cent duty on hides and 20 per cent on sole leather, has an additional protection for his finished product of only 5 or 10 per cent.

The first statement is that because American shoe manufacturers are operating some wonderful machinery designed to lessen the cost of production some of them are willing to take their chances against the pauper labor of Europe if Congress will repeal the duty on hides. The author, inferentially at least, admits that there is pauper labor in Europe. But why can not this pauper labor operate the same machinery? And if that is done, why will our workmen not still be in competition with them? The foreign manufacturer can get the same machinery Americans use. No trouble about that. The shoe manufacturers have had the proposition put up to them time and again to say whether they desired the admission to our markets, free of duty, of foreign-made boots and shoes, but they have never said they did, and they will not say it in our time.

The article states that with free hides our shoe manufacturers would get a chance at an export trade which they are now completely shut out of. This can not be true. The author states that we export only about $50,000 worth of manufactures of leather a year. He misses it by a little matter of more than eleven and a quarter million of dollars. Instead of exporting $50,000 worth a year, we exported, in 1906, $11,326,011 worth of the manufactures of leather. This article states that of leather itself and all its manufactures we export only about a hundred thousand dollars' worth annually. He misses that by more than $45,000,000. We exported last year leather and manufactures of leather to the value of $45,476,969. Mr. Payne's premises being wrong, how can his conclusions be right? When I read his figures I knew he must have found them somewhere, so I made a search, and I believe I know where he got them. He took them from the tables showing the summary of exports of foreign merchandise. He should have consulted the tables showing the exports of domestic merchandise. His figures represent the values of the merchandise named by him which were manufactured, not in America, but abroad, imported to our country, and then exported—reexports they are commonly called. The figures I give you are the exports of domestic manufactures, which were, of course, made in this country by our labor and our factories. This merely illustrates the danger of accepting too hasty an examination of statistics.

Again, Mr. Payne tells us in The Saturday Evening Post that of leather and its manufactures we import from fifteen to twenty million dollars' worth a year. While we did import last year more than $20,000,000 worth, yet if he will take a period of the last ten years he will find the average nearer eleven millions. He also tells us that 135,000,000 pounds of hides (dutiable) were imported last year. This is true; but we exported more than 15,000,000 pounds.

Mr. Payne refers to sole leather and hides as the raw material out of which shoes are made. Again he is in error. Sole leather is made out of hides, so they are really the same thing. The uppers of shoes are made from horse hides, goat, sheep, kangaroo, and calf skins, all of which are now admitted free of duty and constitute in value three-fourths of our importation of hides.

In this article the author deduces the conclusion that because there is a protective duty of 25 per cent on shoes and a 15 per cent duty on the hides and a 20 per cent duty on the sole leather which enter into the manufacture of shoes that consequently the manufacturer has a protection of but 5 or 10 per cent. In this he is mistaken. The material out of which leather for the uppers of most of the shoes worn in this country is made is admitted free of duty. In almost every shoe that is worn the only portions bearing any duty levied on hides are the soles and heels. Very few shoes are made out of cattle hides, and those that are are worn by the farmers, and they get the benefit of the duty on hides. The duty in the soles and heels is less than 2 cents per pair; so, consequently, it is absurd to presume that hides and sole leather are the only raw materials used and that the duty levied on them reduces the protection given shoes.

I direct the attention of the House to this matter to show you how misleading some of the articles are which appear in our magazines. It is no wonder the public is often given wrong impressions. In many cases, as in this one, the errors are not intentional, but are made through a lack of intimate knowledge of the subjects. Many of these agitations hurt legitimate business. The tariff affects this entire country and every citizen in it. Consequently, in the discussions that are bound to come this fall great care should be exercised to be sure of the grounds upon which you base your conclusions.

The next Republican national convention will, in all probability, declare for tariff revision. To secure a Republican revision the next House of Representatives must be Republican. The effect upon American industries of tariff revision by the Democratic party is illustrated by its position on the duties on cattle hides and on manufactures from leather.

Republican revision means that the difference in wages paid here and abroad shall enter into the settlement of the schedules. Democratic revision would give this difference no consideration. Republican revision means that the American wage-earners' mode of living shall be compared with that of the workmen of foreign lands. Democratic revision pays no heed to that. Republican revision will protect both the high wages and the better mode of living so generally enjoyed in this country. Democratic revision will protect neither. One of the great issues in November, then, will be whether or not Americans want such a revision as will give us a protective tariff or a tariff for revenue only; a revision by protectionists or by free traders; a revision by the friends of protection or by its enemies; a revision by the Republican party or by the Democratic party. That will be the great issue for the American electorate to decide. The history of our country and the experience of our people leave no room to doubt what the result will be. [Loud applause.]

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose, and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. DALZELL, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 20063, the District of Columbia appropriation bill, and had directed him to report that it had come to no resolution thereon.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. WILSON of Illinois, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bill of the following title, when the Speaker signed the same.

H. R. 19955. An act making appropriations to supply certain additional urgent deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1908.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

Mr. ADAIR, by unanimous consent, was granted leave to withdraw from the files of the House, without leaving copies, the papers in the case of James B. Mulford, H. R. 13108, Sixtieth Congress, no adverse report having been made thereon.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a division.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I rise for the purpose of asking a division.

The House divided, and there were—ayes 170, noes 41.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken, and there were—yeas 88, nays 82, answered "present" 16, not voting 202, as follows:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, April 4, 1908.

The House met at 12 o'clock m.

The following prayer was offered by Rev. W. H. MCGLAUFLIN, of Chicago:

O God of the ages past, we invoke Thy blessing upon this new day.

May Thy favor and Thy free spirit, operative everywhere, be recognized and sought for by this assembly.

"Surely, except the Lord shall build the house, they labor in vain who build it; except the Lord keep the city, the watchman waketh but in vain."

Here be the consciousness that these hours are for cooperation with Thee in the affairs of a great people. By what is attempted, as by what is accomplished, this day within these walls may helpfulness throughout all our country come to be more helpful, wisdom more wise, justice more just.

And so may the words of every mouth and the meditation of every heart be acceptable in Thy sight, O Lord, our strength and our Redeemer. Amen.

DIPLOMATIC AND CONSULAR APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. COUSINS, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, reported the bill (H. R. 20345) making appropriations for the diplomatic and consular service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1909, which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Speaker, I reserve all points of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York reserves all points of order on the bill.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, I submit the following privileged report from the Committee on Rules.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania submits a report from the Committee on Rules, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That immediately upon the adoption of this rule, and at any time thereafter during the remainder of this session, it shall be in order to take from the Speaker's table any general appropriation bill returned with Senate amendments, and such amendments having been read, the question shall be at once taken without debate or intervening motion of the following question: "Will the House disagree to said amendments en bloc and ask a conference with the Senate?" And if this motion shall be decided in the affirmative, the Speaker shall at once appoint the conferees, without the intervention of any motion. If the House shall decide said motion in the negative, the effect of said vote shall be to agree to the said amendments.

And further, for the remainder of this session the motion to take a recess shall be a privileged motion, taking precedence of the motion to adjourn, and shall be decided without debate or amendment.

And further, during the remainder of this session, it shall be in order to close debate by motion in the House before going into Committee of the Whole, which motion shall not be subject to either amendment or debate.

[Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Speaker, would it not be well to add to that, "That hereafter the Democrats shall have nothing more to say?" [Laughter.]

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this rule, like the purpose of the rule that was introduced yesterday, is to expedite the public business.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield to the gentleman from Mississippi?

Mr. DALZELL. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I wish to ask the gentleman a question. I wish to ask, before we proceed, whether the minority members of the Committee on Rules will be accorded the usual twenty minutes?

Mr. DALZELL. They will not.

Mr. WILLIAMS. They will not! I just wanted the House and the country to know that fact before we start this debate.

Mr. DALZELL. As I say, the purpose of the rule is to expedite the public business and release the House from the grasp of this idiotic filibuster inaugurated by the gentleman from Mississippi [applause on the Republican side]; to prevent the waste of public time at the public expense [laughter on the Democratic side and applause on the Republican side]; to enable the majority to consider and enact into law the great supply bills upon which the existence of the Government depends. [Laughter on the Democratic side and applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. Speaker, let me explain at some length, perhaps, this rule.

Mr. SULZER. It needs explanation.

Mr. DALZELL. I do not think I could make an explanation that would reach the gentleman from New York. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. SULZER. Not on anything like this.

Mr. DALZELL. When the House is acting in the usual orderly and decent way in the conduct of its business, when a general appropriation bill with Senate amendments comes over to the House it is taken from the Speaker's table by unanimous consent, and the Senate amendments are concurred in or disagreed to. This is the ordinary courteous way of doing business between the two Houses. That is the orderly method whereby the minds of the two Houses are brought together and law is enacted. But if unanimous consent be not granted, if the minority of the House be indulging in useless obstruction of public business in a disgraceful filibuster, then the bill must in the natural course go to the Committee on Appropriations. When it comes back from the Committee on Appropriations a motion to go into Committee of the Whole for the consideration of its report is subject to the statesmanlike demand of the yeas and nays on the motion. Nay, more. There may be possibly three demands for the yeas and nays on the motion to go into Committee of the Whole, on the previous question, and possibly on another motion. After the bill has been treated in the Committee of the Whole and the usual statesmanlike call for tellers and other dilatory proceedings have been indulged in, it comes back into the House and it may be subject to hundreds of calls of the roll if there be so many Senate amendments, and the call of the roll on the adoption of the previous question, a call of the roll on the adoption of the report of the Committee of the Whole, and so it will be observed that it is in the power of the minority in the exercise of an abused constitutional right to obstruct the business of the House, waste the people's time and the people's money, and all for no purpose save delay. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Another provision of this rule is that from this time forward a motion to take a recess shall be a privileged motion and take precedence of the motion to adjourn, and not be subject either to amendment or debate. In this way it will be in the power of the majority to cut off many of these useless roll calls. A further provision is that it shall be in order to close debate by motion in the House before going into Committee of the Whole, which, I think, outside of this rule, would be a sensible rule at all times.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] says that he is not indulging in any filibuster. Does he believe that he can fool the people of this country by any such statement as that?

Does he believe that the people in this country can be persuaded that any principle is involved in a demand for the yeas and nays on the approval of the Journal and then voting for the approval of the Journal? Can any man conceive of a more asinine performance than that? [Applause on the Republican side.] Does he believe that he can fool the people of this country; that there is any principle involved in a demand for the yeas and nays on a motion to go into Committee of the Whole to consider the passing of the great supply bills on which the existence of the Government depends? Does he believe that he can persuade the people of this country that there is any principle involved in a call for the yeas and nays on a motion to adjourn at half past 9 in the evening?

The gentleman from New York is complained of because he spoke of this performance as puerile. Nay, it is childish and a disgrace to grown men of full stature. [Applause on the Republican side.] What a sweet little story we heard yesterday about old black Lucy and little Johnny at Grand Junction running away from a Chinese gong! I could not help thinking of what a wave of pride would have passed over that old black Lucy's face could she have foreseen little Johnny rising to the heights of a sublime statesmanship in demanding the yeas and nays on a motion to adjourn in the House of Representatives. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

After playing all day, little Johnny is unwilling to take his dolls and dishes and go home without the exhibition of this last piece of statesmanship in calling for the yeas and nays on a motion to adjourn.

Mr. Speaker, I now move the previous question.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield to me for two minutes?

Mr. DALZELL. No; I will not yield to the gentleman for two seconds. [Prolonged laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. SULZER. That is because the gentleman does not dare to do it.

The SPEAKER. The question is on ordering the previous question.

The question was taken.

The SPEAKER. The ayes seem to have it; the ayes have it, and the previous question is ordered.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I call for a division.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman comes too late.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I rose to ask for it as soon as the Speaker's decision was pronounced.

The SPEAKER. Ah, but that is too late.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Unless the Speaker pronounces the result of the aye-and-no vote, a Member can not call for a division until after the Speaker has said that the ayes seem to have it.

Mr. MANN. That is just what the Chair did say.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Which the Speaker omitted to say; or, if the Speaker did say it, I did not hear him. I did not hear the Chair speak the usual phrase, "The ayes seem to have it." Of course, if the Speaker says he did, I know he did.

The SPEAKER. The vote was put, the ayes and the noes, and the Speaker announced, not in a low voice, but in the usual voice, "The ayes seem to have it," and looking at the gentleman, paused a moment, and the gentleman remaining in his seat, the Speaker said, "The ayes have it, and the previous question is ordered."

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry. I ask for information. Of course, as a matter of fact, any statement from the present occupant of the chair made to me goes with absolute verity. Did the Speaker say, "The ayes seem to have it," before he said, "The ayes have it?" Did the Speaker say, "The ayes seem to have it?"

The SPEAKER. The Chair can not answer that question, but the Chair did say that "The ayes seem to have it" or "The ayes have it, and the previous question is ordered," waiting a little space of time between the announcement and the announcement that the previous question was ordered.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry. Is it not usual for the Speaker to say, first, "The ayes seem to have it," and then afterwards to say, "The ayes have it?" Now then, if in answer to that question the Speaker responds in the affirmative, then I ask the Speaker whether on this occasion he did say, "The ayes seem to have it?"

The SPEAKER. The Chair will get the reporter's notes of what he did say.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, so far as I am concerned, I have such absolute confidence in the veracity of the Chair that the Chair does not need to support any statement he makes to me by any notes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi asked the Chair the question as to whether the Chair said, "The ayes seem to have it; the ayes have it." The Chair did announce that the previous question was ordered after waiting a small space of time and looking at the gentleman.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, perhaps the Chair misunderstands me now.

The SPEAKER. No.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I am not disputing any statement of the Chair. I am merely asking the Chair to make a statement of what occurred. If the Chair does not remember, of course the Chair can refer to the stenographer's notes, but I do not want to appear before the country as putting myself in the attitude of even thinking that the Chair needs to support any statement of his by the notes, and I would not want the Chair to think that.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands that perfectly; there will be no personal difficulties. [Laughter and applause on both sides.] The Clerk will read the copy of the reporter's notes which has been handed to the Chair.

The Clerk read as follows:

The question is on ordering the previous question. The ayes seem to have it; the ayes have it, and the previous question is ordered.

[Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. WILLIAMS. Now, Mr. Speaker, that being the case, I admit that it was I myself who was at fault and not the Speaker. It is due to him and me both that I should say that much. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Division, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken, and there were—yeas 139, nays 119, answered "present" 15, not voting 115, as follows:

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. DALZELL in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the District appropriation bill. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the half of the following sums named, respectively, is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, and the other half out of the revenues of the District of Columbia, in full for the purposes following, being for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1909, namely.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the first six words of the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment of the gentleman from Texas.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out the first six words of the paragraph, being "That the half of the following."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided, and there were—ayes 40, noes 60.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I call for tellers.

Tellers were ordered.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. GARDNER] and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY] will take their places as tellers.

The committee again divided, and the tellers reported—ayes 55, noes 67.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. PADGETT. On line 3, page 1, I move to strike out the words "sums named, respectively, is hereby appropriated."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will put his amendment in writing and send it to the Clerk's desk. The Chair will not entertain any motion unless the amendments are sent to the desk in writing, under the rule.

Mr. MANN. I move to strike out the last word. Mr. Chairman, it does not seem to me——

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. The gentleman must put his amendment in writing.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will exercise discretion about that. [Laughter.]

Mr. MANN. I move to close all debate upon this paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois moves that all debate upon the present paragraph be now closed.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Division!

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas demands a division. The question was taken, and there were—ayes 55, noes 47.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. GARDNER] and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY] will take their places as tellers.

The committee again divided, and the tellers reported—ayes 68, noes 53.

So the motion was agreed to.

Mr. PADGETT. I send the amendment to the desk.

Mr. HARDY. A parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HARDY. Is it the ruling of the Chair that Democratic amendments must be in writing and Republican amendments need not?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is out of order.

Mr. WILSON of Illinois. As usual.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, lines 2 and 3, strike out the words "sums named, repectively, is hereby appropriated."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. PADGETT. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided, and there were—ayes 45, noes 60.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I call for tellers, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that, having passed upon that twice, it is clear that the motion is dilatory.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. LEAKE. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out of line 4 the words "out of any money in the."

Mr. PAYNE. I make the point of order on this that it is dilatory.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. LEAKE. Will not the Chair hear me on the other side of the point of order?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will not.

Mr. LEAKE. I appeal from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. PAYNE. I make the point of order that the appeal is dilatory.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I offer the following amendment:

Lines 4 and 5, strike out the words "Treasury not otherwise appropriated."

Mr. PAYNE. I make the point of order on that, that it is dilatory.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Will the Chair hear me on my point of order?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not care to hear the gentleman.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. The Chair does not think it is proper, then, to strike out any of the language in the bill?

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Plumbing inspection division: Inspector of plumbing, $2,000; seven assistant inspectors of plumbing, one at $1,200 and six at $1,000 each; temporary employment of additional assistant inspectors of plumbing and laborers for such time as their services may be necessary, $1,200; draftsman, $1,200; sewer tapper, $1,000; three members of the plumbing board, at $300 each; in all, $100,764.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I want some information. I wish to ask the gentleman in charge of this bill if all these various inspectors are now being employed by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia?

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. They are all employed, except that one provided for in this bill has been on the per diem list and is transferred to the annual list.

Mr. SULZER. And these inspectors are necessary, are they?

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Absolutely so, as it is reported to us; necessary to carry out the provisions of the law already passed.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman, no one realizes more than I do the importance of this bill. I am very much in favor of doing anything I can within reasonable limits for the District of Columbia. I want to see Washington become the "City Beautiful," one of the greatest, one of the grandest, and one of the most beautiful capitals on earth. Ever since I have been a Member of Congress I have done my best to carry out the original plans and projects of those who laid out and founded this capital city. Let us at every opportunity do our best to complete what they contemplated.

Now, sir, it was a matter of much regret to me that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr DALZELL] reported this morning the rule which he did, which practically cuts off all general debate on this very important bill, and deprives the minority of its inherent rights of discussion under the rules. I am always opposed, in a deliberative and legislative body, to gag rule. Nothing in the long run is accomplished by the majority gagging the minority.

Mr. VREELAND. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the gentleman from New York is not speaking to the amendment.

Mr. SULZER. I am speaking to the amendment, Mr. Chairman. I am talking about the bill, and I am talking about how important this bill is, not only to the people of the District of Columbia, but to the people of the country generally.

Mr. VREELAND. I insist on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the point of order is well taken. The gentleman must confine himself to his amendment.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman, I am endeavoring, to the best of my ability, to confine myself to the bill under consideration, notwithstanding the remarks that I am making are not directed particularly to the paragraph which has just been read. I am in favor of this paragraph. I want to see the paragraph adopted. I want to see the men—the skilled mechanics—who are out of work in the District of Columbia get employment. If I had my way, I would have the Government, in so far as it can, inaugurate great internal improvements that would give immediate employment to the hundreds of thousands of idle, honest workmen in the country. We could not do better, and for that reason I am in favor of the provision which has just been read. I want to see the mechanics who are not employed today in this District get employment.

Now, I want to say again that, in my opinion, no progress will be made along the lines contemplated by the majority for partisan legislation, if the majority, taking advantage of its numbers, brings in every morning a special rule to gag the minority, to prevent us from getting our rights, and from securing time to discuss legislation of an important character.

Mr. VREELAND. Mr. Chairman, I again make the point of order that the gentleman is not speaking to his amendment.

Mr. SULZER. I hope my friend from New York will not continually bob up and interrupt my speech.

Mr. VREELAND. Mr. Chairman, I insist on my point of order.

Mr. SULZER. I can not finish what I have to say in five minutes——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. SULZER. A great deal of my time has been consumed by my colleague from New York, and I ask unanimous consent to address the committee for five minutes more.

Mr. VREELAND. Regular order!

Mr. SULZER. I ask unanimous consent to address the committee for five minutes.

Mr. VREELAND. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is made.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. Who objects?

Mr. VREELAND. I object.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. The gentleman from New York did not rise in his place and object.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair heard the objection.

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking the gentleman in charge of the bill a question in relation to this paragraph: "Three members of the plumbing board, at $300 each." I would like to ask the gentleman what the duties of the plumbing board are.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. They have to license all plumbers in the District.

Mr. MURPHY. I would like to ask the gentleman how the board is constituted. I am asking this for information, and I presume the gentleman can furnish the information.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. One is the inspector of plumbing. The other two are outside of what may be called the "plumbing force" of the city.

Mr. MURPHY. Does the gentleman mean that the plumbing board receives an additional compensation for their services rendered as plumbers of the District?

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Only one, as I understand it.

Mr. MURPHY. There is one that receives an additional compensation?

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. I think so.

Mr. MURPHY. What is his compensation?

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. He is under the regular employment of the city, and gets the compensation as such—I think, about $1,200.

Mr. MURPHY. We are paying two salaries, then, to this man?

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Yes; that is done a great many times, because he performs services outside of the duties for which he is paid a salary. That happens repeatedly in other departments of the city. We have already passed several matters of that kind.

Mr. MURPHY. I asked the question for information, and believe it is not good policy.

Mr. VREELAND. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this paragraph and amendments thereto be now closed.

The question was taken, and on a division (demanded by Mr. WILLIAMS) there were—ayes 77, noes 41.

So the motion was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For assessor's office: For assessor, $3,500, and $500 additional as chairman of the excise and personal tax boards; two assistant assessors, at $2,000 each; two clerks, at $1,400 each; clerk, arrears division, $1,400; four clerks, at $1,200 each; draftsman, $1,200; four clerks, at $1,000 each; assistant or clerk, $900; clerk in charge of records, $1,000; two clerks, at $900 each; license clerk, $1,200; two clerks, at $1,000 each; inspector of licenses, $1,200; assistant inspector of licenses, $1,000; messenger, $600; three assistant assessors, at $3,000 each; clerk to board of assistant assessors, $1,500; messenger and driver, for board of assistant assessors, $600; temporary clerk hire, $500; in all, $43,500.

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I wish to ask for some information from the gentleman in charge of the bill. This provides, in line 2, page 6, for one draftsman at $1,200 and four clerks at $1,000 each. I want to ask the gentleman exactly what are the duties of this draftsman?

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Just exactly what the title indicates. There are buildings in process of construction, and this draftsman contributes materially to the extent of providing plans and specifications.

Mr. MURPHY. Is it necessary to have four clerks at $1,000 each for one draftsman worth $1,200?

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. We have to get help in addition to that.

Mr. MURPHY. Are these clerks employed on any other duties?

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Not to my knowledge.

The Clerk read as follows:

Excise board: For chief clerk, $2,000; clerk $1,200; clerk, $1,000; messenger, $600; in all, $4,800.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. If I can get the attention of the gentleman from Michigan, I want to find out how many licenses are granted or permits issued in the District of Columbia each year.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, that is a subject the committee did not go into—a subject the committee did not feel called upon to go into in making the appropriation—and I am not able to say how many.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. It occurred to me, Mr. Chairman, that four men to look after the permits and licenses that might be issued in the District of Columbia was a pretty large force.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. It has been current law for years, and their duties are constantly increasing, rather than diminishing.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. I want to ask another question, not pertinent to this paragraph, but to the one that precedes and the one that follows the one we are now on. How many taxpayers are there in the District of Columbia?

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. The gentleman means the number of taxpayers?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Yes; real estate and personal.

Mr. GARDNER. That is another subject that the committee did not feel called upon to go into. We were not interested in the number of taxpayers, but rather in what they are paying. We were concerned more about the revenue derived than the number from whom it was derived.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. I do not know, Mr. Chairman, that the amount of money has much to do with it. A tax assessor may employ as much time in collecting taxes from some citizen who pays on $20 worth of property as it would take him to receive the taxes from some great corporation that pays taxes on $20,000,000. So that the number of taxpayers must necessarily be computed in order to determine how much work these people have to do. For instance, if the Chairman will allow me to state it—and, by the way, I want to congratulate the chairman on this bill, for it suits me better than any District bill I ever saw—for instance, in the county in which I live there are more than 20,000 taxpayers, some of them very small taxpayers and some of them may be very large. Yet one man is required to assess the property of all the taxpayers in that county. He makes his caluculations as to the taxes due by each taxpayer for school purposes, for county purposes, or for any other purpose. Now, it seems to me that in the District of Columbia, where two years ago there were 11,000 taxpayers, a force of something like 100 men to assess the property and collect the taxes and disburse the money is extravagant. I hope my friend in making up the next bill will look into that.

Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Personal tax board: For two assistant assessors of personal taxes, at $3,000 each; appraiser of personal property, $1,800; clerk, $1,400; assistant clerk, $1,000; three inspectors, at $1,200 each; extra clerk hire, $2,000; in all, $15,800.

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of getting the attention, if I may, of the gentleman in charge of the bill, and I desire to say at this time that I agree with the gentleman who preceded me—the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. JOHNSON]—as to the fact that I believe that the committee has done conscientious work on this bill; but so many officers are provided for in this assessment of personal taxes that I would like to ask the gentleman if he can give us information on the amount of personal-property taxes assessed in the District?

Mr. BURLESON. Does the gentleman mean the amount collected?

Mr. MURPHY. The amount assessed; yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. The amount collected is about $800,000, and at this time I desire to correct the statement I made a moment ago. I said there were 11,000 taxpayers. There were 11,000 taxpayers of real estate. I don't know how many personal-tax payers there are, but they collect $800,000, and this enormous force is kept here to assess property and collect that amount of money. I understand they assess here only once in three years.

Mr. MURPHY. I desired to ask if they assess every year.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. They assess real estate every three years.

Mr. BOWERS. Personal property is assessed every year.

Mr. MURPHY. How much of the personal-property tax is delinquent—not collected? Can the gentleman inform me?

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. No; I do not know, and I don't know that anybody can give that information outside of the collector's office.

The Clerk read as follows:

Hereafter all legal services required by boards organized by law under the government of the District of Columbia shall be furnished by the corporation counsel of the District of Columbia, or one of his assistants.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order on that paragraph. It seems to me rather queer wording to begin with. What is the idea of it?

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. In explanation of this paragraph, Mr. Chairman, I would say that it is well known in the Congress, as well as in the District, and to a considerable extent in the country at large, that during the last year the board of education has had some trouble with some of the officers of the public schools, and on account of that trouble they employed counsel aside from that connected with the corporation counsel force. The school board wanted to have an appropriation made of $1,200 to compensate said counsel. The committee refused to make the appropriation for that purpose, and to avoid going outside for counsel, which is provided for such purposes, they have put this paragraph in the bill, so that in the future the board of education, as the Commissioners and everybody else connected with the District government bringing suit, will go to the corporation counsel, rather than to the United States district attorney or somebody else and then bring in a bill for the Government to pay.

Mr. MANN. A few years ago the school board was appointed by the District Commissioners. Congress saw fit, against my vote, to provide that the District Commissioners should not have control in the school board. The gentleman proposes now to let the corporation counsel run the school board.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Not in the least.

Mr. MANN. Suppose there is a difference of opinion between the District Commissioners and the school board about this. Can they both take advice of the corporation counsel?

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. There is more than one member of the corporation counsel's office. There is only one corporation counsel, but there is a corps of assistants.

Mr. MANN. None of the assistant corporation counsel would put forth an opinion unless it met the views of the head of the office.

Mr. STAFFORD. Can the gentleman advance any reason why the school board should not take the judgment of the corporation counsel? Is the gentleman acquainted with any municipality where the school board has different counsel from that of the other branches of the city government?

Mr. MANN. I am not acquainted with any large municipality where the legal adviser of the school board is the same as the legal adviser of the city, because there are constant controversies between the so-called "city government" and the school board, and to have the same legal adviser would be, it would seem to me, a queer proceeding.

Mr. STAFFORD. If the gentleman will permit I can say, so far as Milwaukee is concerned, that they have the same legal adviser, and there is no friction between the respective parties.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. The gentleman will observe under this paragraph the members of the school board could not out of their own means employ private counsel. It requires the corporation counsel to represent the board, and if there should be a controversy between the two boards, as the gentleman said a moment ago, the corporation counsel would have to represent both sides. The members of neither board could out of their funds employ private counsel to represent them, because the paragraph says the corporation counsel shall furnish all legal services for all boards.

Mr. MANN. And, I take it, the intention is to furnish the school board no legal adviser, because there is no increase in the appropriation over what it was before, and either the corporation counsel's office was too large before or else he will not be able to furnish the information that will be sought for now.

Mr. STAFFORD. Carrying the argument of the gentleman from Indiana to the logical extreme would result in having legal advisers for the various executive departments, and I hardly think the gentleman would say that it is the best kind of administration for a municipality to have separate departments of legal counsel for the various executive departments.

Mr. MANN. But Congress has seen fit to differentiate between the District government and the school board. It has not made that differentiation between the assessors or other branches of the District government only so far as the method of appointments is concerned, and the school board may be entirely without the appointive power of the head of a municipality over any department connected therewith, and yet that department will have, in case of need of legal services, to call on the corporation counsel for it.

I believe we are all guided somewhat by what obtains at home. In the city which I have the honor in part to represent the school board is appointed by the mayor, but the corporation counsel of the city is not the legal adviser of the school board. The school board has an attorney for itself, and it has not infrequently happened that the school board attorney and the corporation counsel of the city disagree about matters, and it sometimes has to be carried into court, where the court settles the question.

Mr. BOWERS. I desire to correct a misapprehension under which the gentleman seems to labor and call attention to the reason why we decided the corporation counsel should be employed for this particular service. I gather from the remark he made a moment ago that he assumes that the corporation counsel's office was overcrowded and unable to do this. That, as I understand, is not the case, and no increase of appropriation or of force for the corporation counsel's office is made, because none was deemed necessary at the hearing. We gathered very clearly that the corporation counsel's office would be able to do this work without any additional appropriation and without any increase in force. The object is economy, pure and simple, in order to prevent a recurrence of just what we have had this year, namely, the calling in of one of the officers of the Department of Justice to attend to a particular piece of litigation and thereby creating a sort of demand against the Government. It is to require them to go to the force of legal advisers provided for all municipal affairs.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] a question. Who has been advising this school board here in the last twelve months?

Mr. MANN. I am not able to answer the gentleman. I have taken no special interest and do now take no special interest in what seems to me a very unseemly squabble between somebody and somebody else. Just who the persons are I do not know, and I do not care.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. What objection have you to the corporation counsel advising that eminent body?

Mr. MANN. I have no objection to the corporation counsel advising the eminent body at all. What I object to is that when Congress attempts to differentiate between the school board and the District Commissioners, and Congress provides that the school board shall be appointed by persons other than the District Commissioners, to require them to take their legal advice from somebody appointed by the District Commissioners.

Mr. BOWERS. The corporation counsel are not appointed by the District Commissioners.

Mr. MANN. Who are they appointed by?

Mr. BOWERS. My understanding is that they are appointed by the President; that is, the chief corporation counsel of the District.

Mr. MANN. Appointed by the President, and confirmed by the Senate?

Mr. BOWERS. I think so.

Mr. MANN. I think not; but I do not know.

Mr. BOWERS. I may be mistaken; but that is my impression.

Mr. MANN. I do not think there are any of these officers appointed by the President except the District Commissioners.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. If the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] does not know what I do not know, I had better ask the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. GARDNER]. Can the corporation counsel attend to this business without having another assistant appointed?

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. There has been no demand for another assistant.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Then it ought to be done.

Mr. MANN. There has been no demand to have the work done in this way by the school board? Has the gentleman examined the school board as to whether they need additional counsel?

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. The point is right here, Mr. Chairman, that they did not go to the corporation counsel to ascertain whether they could have his services or not, but went outside of the counsel that the District provides. Now, if one board can do this another can, namely, the excise board, the automobile board, or the board of charities. Each one of them can employ a legal firm and come up here with bills to be paid by the Congress, when we have a legal board from which they can draw talent in all of these cases to meet the necessities of the District.

Mr. MANN. Now, let us see whether the gentleman is correct or not. Are these boards appointed under a special act of Congress, requiring somebody to appoint them other than the District Commissioners?

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. The board of charities is appointed, for example, by the President.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman propose that they shall be in no case allowed to employ outside counsel?

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. If they can have counsel to properly represent the interests of that board from the corporation counsel, I should say no.

Mr. STAFFORD. If the Chairman will permit, does it not largely come down to a question whether there is sufficient legal business before the school board to require the services of some separate attorney all the time? For instance, in the city that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] represents in part there may be need for having the employment of special counsel there, or more than one counsel to look after specially the work of the school board, but in the city of Washington it may not be necessary to have any one individual——

Mr. MANN. We hope it will not be.

Mr. STAFFORD. Or several individuals to give their exclusive time to that work.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would like to know from the gentleman from Illinois if he makes a point of order.

Mr. MANN. I make a point of order, Mr. Chairman, unless somebody wants to be heard.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I would like to be heard, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. MANN. I reserve the point of order.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. If the Chair has already ruled on the point of order, that is the end of it. I did not want to argue the point of order, but make some remarks as to who ought to attend to this law business in the city of Washington.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Those of us who have been here six, or eight, or ten years, know that this school board has been in a constant row all of that time.

We remodeled this whole system two years ago. Some of the very best men of the House worked at it faithfully and incessantly to revolutionize the system about this school board, and we thought that we had it fixed; but that bill was scarcely passed until they got up a worse row than they had had before; and, so far as I know, it is going on yet. I secured the adoption of an amendment to the bill guaranteeing to every teacher and employee that was put upon examination or trial the right to have either counsel or at least one friend attending; and the first thing anybody knew on the subject, the board had gone to work and by a rule practically nullified the law passed by Congress. I do not know the fact to be that way; I do not know certainly of my own knowledge, but I understand the President of the United States detailed a lawyer from the Department of Justice to help this school board along.

Mr. BOWERS. At their request?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. At their request. The chances are that if they had been compelled to go to the corporation counsel as they ought to have gone, they would not have had half as much of a row as they have had. It is certainly a great waste of raw material to have a lawyer designated whose sole duty shall be to attend to the school-board business of the city of Washington. I undertake to say, without the fear of successful contradiction, that a reasonably good lawyer could transact all the business that that board ought to have by working at it one day out of the week. The practice should be, to satisfy the gentleman from Illinois, and the suggestion of the gentleman from Wisconsin, that some one of the assistants to the corporation counsel ought to be assigned, not as his whole duty but as part of his duty, to look after the legal affairs of the schools of the District of Columbia, and the quicker that can be done here the better it will be; and if it can not be done under this bill, there ought to be a special bill brought in to that effect. The present arrangement is an extravagance and there is no sense in it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has already sustained the point of order. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For coroner's office: For coroner, $1,800; morgue master, $720; assistant morgue master and janitor, $480; in all, $3,000.

Mr. SULZER. I move to strike out the last word. I wish to inquire of the gentleman in charge of the bill, What are the duties of the morgue master?

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. In the first place, the words would indicate themselves what his duties are. The morgue master has charge of the morgue. In case of suicide or drowning or murder or persons who may have died, the bodies are taken to the morgue until they are properly cared for. or until they are claimed or otherwise disposed of. In brief, those are his duties, as I understand it.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman, just a few words. Of course it is known that there is a morgue in Washington, and, no doubt, there must be a morgue master; but I am impelled to observe, after an experience in the minority here of almost fourteen years, that there should be a morgue committee in the House of Representatives. The majority have killed so many good measures that it seems to me it would be appropriate to have a "committee on the morgue" [laughter], in which all of these good bills in the interests of the people introduced by Democrats generally find their way before a Republican Congress adjourns.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Does not my colleague——

Mr. SULZER. I have only a few moments, but I yield for a question.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I wish to ask my colleague if he does not believe that "official embalmer" would be more appropriate than "morgue master?"

Mr. SULZER. I care not what the gentleman wants to call it; but there is one thing certain, and that is, in the House of Representatives there is a morgue for good bills. I have been trying to find out just what committee is the morgue committee. [Laughter.] My own personal experience is to the effect that there are several committees that have earned the appellation. There is the Committee on the Judiciary. It is a morgue committee for good bills; the Committee on Ways and Means is a morgue committee for good bills, and the Committee on Appropriations is a morgue committee for good bills——

Mr. FITZGERALD. Oh, no.

Mr. SULZER. Then, the Committee on Claims is a morgue committee for good bills; the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce is a morgue committee for good bills, and the Committee on Labor is a morgue committee for good bills—to say nothing about other committees of the House. We all know that a great many bills are introduced every year in Congress—bills that affect the people generally of the entire country, and which the people of the country want reported favorably, and considered in the House in accordance with the rules; and we all know that these bills are referred by the Speaker to these morgue committees, and that is an end of the matter. We can not get a hearing from some of these committees on the bills. They are strangled in these morgue committees, put to sleep in the pigeonholes, and that is an end of it. We do not legislate in accordance with the rules. We do not get an opportunity to consider the bills the people are most deeply interested in, and which would accomplish the most good.

Now, sir, I suggest that the rules of the House be changed, so that there will be one great committee to be called the "Morgue Committee," to which all these great and good bills introduced by Democrats—and opposed by a few Republicans—can be referred. Then we will know what to expect; then we will know that there is no use trying to resurrect them; and then we will know that these bills are absolutely dead.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The Clerk read as follows:

For engineer's office (Record division): For engineer of highways, $3,000; engineer of bridges, $2,100; superintendent of streets, $2,000; superintendent of county roads, $1,500, and $500 additional as assistant engineer in Rock Creek Park; superintendent of sewers, $3,000; inspector of asphalts and cements, $2,400 (Provided, That the inspector of asphalts and cements shall not receive or accept compensation of any kind from, or perform any work or render any services of a character required of him officially by the District of Columbia to, any person, firm, corporation, or municipality other than the District of Columbia); assistant inspector of asphalts and cements, $1,500; superintendent of repairs, $1,500; superintendent of trees and parkings, $1,500; assistant superintendent of trees and parkings, $1,000; assistant engineer, $2,200; assistant engineer, $2,100; four assistant engineers, at $1,800 each; one assistant engineer, $1,600; five assistant engineers, $1,500; one assistant engineer, $1,350; one assistant engineer, $1,200; two transitmen, at $1,200 each; one transitman, $1,050; four rodmen, at $900 each; eight rodmen, at $780 each; twelve chainmen, at $650 each; two draftsmen, $1,350 each; two draftsmen, at $1,200 each; one draftsman, $1,050; one general inspector of sewers, $1,300; one inspector of sewers, $1,200; one bridge inspector, $1,200; two inspectors, at $1,500 each; three inspectors of streets, at $1,200 each; three inspectors, at $1,200 each; one inspector, $1,000; one inspector, $900; twelve foremen, at $1,200 each; one foreman, Rock Creek Park, $1,200; three subforemen, at $1,050 each; one foreman, $1,050; ten foremen, at $900 each; one bridgekeeper, $650; three bridgekeepers, at $600 each; two inspectors of property, at $936 each; two property yard keepers, at $1,000 each; one inspector of material, $1,200; chief clerk, $1,900; clerk, $1,800; clerk, $1,600; two clerks, at $1,500 each; permit clerk, $1,500; assistant permit clerk, $900; index clerk and typewriter, $720; two clerks, at $1,400 each; two clerks, at $1,350 each; five clerks, at $1,200 each; one clerk, $1,050; two clerks, at $1,000 each; clerk, $900; clerk, $840; two clerks, at $750 each; clerk, $620; clerk, $600; seven messengers, at $540 each; two skilled laborers, at $600 each; skilled laborer, $625; janitor, $720; principal steam engineer, $1,800; three steam engineers, at $1,200 each; three assistant steam engineers, at $1,050 each; six oilers, at $600 each; six firemen, at $875 each; inspector, $1,400; storekeeper, $900; superintendent of stables, $1,500; blacksmith, $975; two watchmen, at $630 each; two drivers, at $630 each; driver, $540; inspector of gas and meters, $2,000; assistant inspector of gas and meters, $1,000; assistant inspector of gas and meters, $840; messenger, $540; in all, $188,882.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Here is a big road machine, so to speak, located in this bill, under the heading "Engineer's office." I see there is a great deal of road-making machinery. I would ask the gentleman in charge of the bill if these engineers are building "county roads?" If so, how much is paid from the Federal Treasury and how much from the District of Columbia treasury to do the work? Over on page 29 I find something on the same subject in these words:

Repair county roads: For current work of repairs of county roads and suburban streets, $100,000.

Mr. Chairman, I should like to know how these "county roads" are made and who pays for them.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Precisely the same as the pavements here in the city—one half paid for by the Government and the other half paid for by the District of Columbia.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Does the Government of the United States pay to make county roads away out here, say, 10 miles from the Capitol?

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. All the roads referred to here are within the limits of the District of Columbia.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. But this says "county roads."

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. A part of the District is designated as the county.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I should like to have the gentleman explain fully to the committee, because I am anxious to know. I want to get the information and have the House get the information. I should like to know how it is done, because if the Government of the United States builds county roads in the District of Columbia it looks to me like Congress might do a little bit of work for some of the rural-route roads out in my State, where you can not go with automobiles, where you can hardly walk, ride, or drive; where an eagle has to fly pretty high up to avoid the crags and cliffs, and where rural routes are discontinued because of bad roads. It seems to me that the Government of the United States ought to take a little money and go down to these discontinued routes and see what the trouble is, and see if it can not help the people of the locality to build up these route roads for the purpose of reestablishing the discontinued rural mail routes and help these people out. I should like to get all the information the gentleman can give me on that subject.

Mr. BOWERS. I was going to call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that he has misapprehended what the words "county roads" in this bill mean.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Out in Tennessee——

Mr. BOWERS. Let me finish my statement. Every street in this city outside the old city limits—say, for example, Florida avenue on the north—is called a county road, when, as a matter of fact, the city has long since extended far out beyond those old limits, and these so-called "county roads" are as thickly built up as any other part of Washington. The great majority of these so-called "county roads" are solidly built up streets in the city.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. That is because they have taken a county road and put asphalt on it, and at night they run these street sweepers and sprinklers over it when the weather gets hot. There are good roads away out, 10 miles or so, from the city of Washington.

Mr. MANN. That is impossible. You can not go 10 miles from this Capitol without getting outside of the limits of the District of Columbia.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Well, away out from the city of Washington—several miles, anyway—where there are no lights and where there are country houses, and yet you can go with an automobile on a beautiful smooth dirt road. I want to know if that is what is called a "county road," out in the rural section of the District of Columbia? If the Government of the United States can maintain such roads here, I want to know why it can not do something to improve rural-route roads in other parts of the country. We certainly can and should experiment with these abandoned rural-route roads and see if the rural service can not be restored. In the sections where these routes are abandoned are good people, the very kind who need to be aided as a rural service aids them. They are in a more deplorable fix than the section where the rural system actually operates. Let experimental rural-route road fixing or building begin. Let the people be taught how to build a lasting, good rural-route road. That is the point of my contention.

Now, I ask my friend, the chairman of the committee, who pays for building the good roads way out yonder in the country?

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. I have answered that previously and I can add nothing to it—one half is paid by the District of Columbia and the other half by the General Government.

Mr. MANN. I would like to ask the gentleman a question. My observation has been that outside of the parks you will fail to find the good roads that the gentleman refers to. Can the gentleman tell us where the good roads are outside of the park system?

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. The gentleman from Illinois had better ask the gentleman from Tennessee. He made the assertion.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. My information is that out over the bridge here, out through the groves of hickory, way out yonder for 8 or 9 miles, you will find very good roads, much better than in many sections of Tennessee or Kentucky or elsewhere. I want to know if the people outside of the city of Washington are provided with good roads at the expense of the Government?

Mr. MANN. The gentleman evidently refers to his trip to Great Falls.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. No, I do not; I have never been to Great Falls.

Mr. BOWERS. Out to Cabin John.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Well, I have been to Cabin John but I went out there in the cars, and a few times on the pike.

Mr. VREELAND. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate and amendment thereto on the pending paragraph be now closed.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Special assessment office: For special assessment clerk, $1,700; seven clerks, at $1,200 each; two clerks, at $900 each; and one clerk, $750; in all, $12,650.

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of getting a little more information from the genial chairman of the committee. I would like to ask what is included in the words "special assessment."

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Where a house is situated on a street, for example, not connected with the water main and they want to connect with the water main or the gas main, they would have to get a special permit, and these special assessments are intended to cover cases like that.

Mr. MURPHY. Is that all that it covers?

Mr. MANN. You can build sewers by special assessment, and that is all covered by this.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Sewers may be built under special conditions. It may run up to a considerable sum in the course of a year.

Mr. MURPHY. I would like to ask a further question, if the gentleman can give the information, What is the amount of the special assessments collected in the District in a year?

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. From $100,000 to $200,000 a year, and the most of it in small amounts.

Mr. MURPHY. It costs $12,650 to collect that.

Mr. MANN. Not to collect it. This is not for the collection, this is for the work.

Mr. MURPHY. Are not other clerks paid for granting permits and licenses?

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. This has been current law for many years.

Mr. MURPHY. I do not question that; I am simply asking for information as to what their duties are and what we are paying $12,000 and more for.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. I have no question but that this is well expended.

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw my pro forma amendment.

Mr. GRIGGS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking that the Clerk read the letter which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the letter will be read in the gentleman's time.

The Clerk read as follows:

OFFICE FOURTH ASSISTANT POSTMASTER-GENERAL,
Washington, April 1, 1908.

Hon. J. M. GRIGGS,
House of Representatives.

SIR: In compliance with your verbal inquiry of this date respecting statements received by you to the effect that the expense incident to rural delivery has been the cause of the deficit in the postal revenues of recent years, I write to say that such statements are not confirmed by the records of the Post-Office Department. In 1897, when the expenditure on account of rural delivery was only $14,840, the postal deficit was $11,411,779, while in 1907 the expenditure for rural delivery had increased to $26,755,524, and the deficit had decreased to $6,653,282. These figures seem to demonstrate that the increased expenditure on account of the rural delivery service bears no ratio to the annual deficit. On the other hand, it is certain that the operation of the rural delivery service is responsible for a very large percentage of the increase in the postal receipts. The establishment of a rural delivery route invariably brings with it a great influx of mail to the locality affected, and this is gradually followed by an increase in the outgoing mail. Of course the revenue from the incoming mail goes to swell the receipts of the larger post-offices, so that while the service greatly benefits the rural communities through the convenience afforded, it also accounts for much of the increased revenue shown by the city offices. It should also be borne in mind that since the inauguration of rural delivery there has been a saving of more than $12,000,000 on account of the closing of small post-offices and discontinuance of star routes.

Rural delivery is being managed under definite and business methods, namely: The Department must be satisfied that the territory to be covered is suitable, and that the routes will be patronized to a reasonable extent before service is established. In the early days of rural delivery there were naturally many routes established which have since proved to have been unwarranted. Such routes are now being rearranged by extension, curtailment, or consolidation with other routes, and in cases where such rearrangement can not be effected, and there is no prospect of reasonable patronage, the service is discontinued and the former mail facilities restored. Discontinuance is often avoided, however, by establishing triweekly instead of daily service, with the understanding that daily service will be restored when conditions justify such action.

On March 1, 1908, there were 38,852 routes in operation, and 888 petitions were pending for establishment of rural delivery which had not been acted upon. This is a great falling off in the number of petitions received as compared with a few years ago. The number of routes installed during the fiscal year 1905–6 averaged 304 per month; during the year ended June 30, 1907, the monthly average was 163 routes. At present the average is little more than 100 per month. The diminution in the demand for the service is principally due to the fact that in the older States the territory available for rural delivery has been practically covered. The requirements in these States now consist largely of rearranging and extending existing routes. In the fast developing sections of the West, however, there is an increased demand for rural service. For example, up to October 15, 1902, there were only 19 rural routes in operation in the Territory of Oklahoma, while on March 1, 1908, the State of Oklahoma had 806 routes, with 84 petitions for service pending.

Reports to the Department of the business transacted on rural routes are interesting, as showing the extent to which the service is patronized. In three months during 1907 two routes from Hollywood, Cal., handled 151,434 pieces of mail; one route from Depew, N. Y., 75,756 pieces; Route No. 1, Westchester, Pa., 72,084, the last named yielding cancellations amounting to $920.28. Routes from Nashville, Tenn., Bingham Canyon, Utah, and North Yakima, Wash., each carried between 60,000 and 70,000 pieces during the same period of time.

The recommendation of the Department that a special rate of postage to cover delivery to patrons on rural routes or at the distributing post-offices thereof of books and merchandise not exceeding 11 pounds for 25 cents, 5 cents for the first pound and 2 cents for each additional pound, such rate of postage to apply only to packages transported on a rural delivery route to or from a patron of said route, while not entailing any additional expense, would undoubtedly greatly increase the revenue derived from the rural service. Such a rate of postage would enable rural patrons to have delivered to them small packages of household supplies of little value, which is not possible at this time because the rate of postage on such matter (1 cent an ounce) is practically prohibitory.

Respectfully,
P. V. DE GRAW,
Fourth Assistant Postmaster-General.

The Clerk read as follows:

Board of examiners, steam engineers: For compensation for board of examiners of steam engineers in the District of Columbia, three, at $300 each, $900.

Mr. GOULDEN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking my friend from Michigan how many steam engineers there are?

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Three on the board.

Mr. GOULDEN. I ask the gentleman how many engineers there are to be examined yearly by these three men constituting the board?

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. The number varies with different years.

Mr. GOULDEN. Does the gentleman know what the requirements are for a steam engineer in the District?

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. No, sir; it is for these gentlemen constituting the board to determine whether they meet the requirements, and the rules are determined by others than the committee.

Mr. GOULDEN. This, then, is existing law and has been found to work successfully, I understand?

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Yes; there is no change.

Mr. GOULDEN. I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of making an inquiry. I would like to ask the gentleman whether he knows the examination required by the board of engineers is the same examination required by the marine board of engineers?

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. No; I can not say. This law has stood here for years, has been accepted, and there has been no complaint, and the committee has accepted it as meeting the requirements.

Mr. MANN. The ordinary examinations are required here such as are required in every city.

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that the salaries that are charged here—$300 each for three members of this board—would not indicate that the examination is a very severe one. Now, I am satisfied that an engineer of a vessel coming into this harbor must pass an examination required by the Government marine board.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. The United States Government runs that. This is a District matter.

Mr. MURPHY. And this is the United States Government also.

Mr. STAFFORD. Of course these examinations do not take place every day in the year, but only at stated intervals, and I question whether more than four examinations are held during the year. There will be some competent engineer who will be paid a fee for presiding for that special purpose, so that $300 a year for each member of the board will be more than adequate to meet the condition for the payment of that kind of service.

Mr. MURPHY. Certainly. I simply want information—to know whether people's lives are imperiled or whether they are properly protected.

Mr. STAFFORD. Does the gentleman know of any instance where they have been jeopardized?

Mr. MURPHY. I do not know but they are jeopardized every day.

Mr. STAFFORD. Does the gentleman know of any concrete instance?

Mr. MURPHY. I can not call to mind any now, but I do in other cities.

Mr. BURLESON. I will state to the gentleman that this board of engineers is under and by authority of law of Congress requiring the inspector of engineers in this city to be the chairman of the board, with two other men appointed for the purpose of examining engineers.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. I think I can give the gentleman the information he wants. I read from the hearings of a previous year, from some answers given by Colonel Biddle, who was long a member of the board here, and an engineer of recognized ability. He was asked the question:

Have they an oral examination?

And he answered as follows:

Yes; an oral examination, and they usually make designs. They are asked to draw a boiler with all of its connections and such things as that—a practical examination. The law does not allow anyone to operate a steam engine without a license and unless they have passed this examination.

That is, the examination and requirements are fixed by the board having the matter in charge.

Mr. MURPHY. I would like to further ask the gentleman if he knows whether engineers can be licensed under this board with less knowledge and less requirements than the Government requires for engineers of vessels.

Mr. MANN. Most of these people are engineers in charge of low-pressure boilers.

Mr. MURPHY. I understand that. That is true. I am asking for information, if the gentleman can give it.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. I am not able to give that. It is a technical matter.

Mr. MURPHY. I think it is a very important matter.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will allow me, the board could sit twelve months in a year, if it could not intrust important responsibilities to men of technical knowledge, of which the board does not presume to have any knowledge, to discharge certain duties. This is one of them; it was composed of engineers to examine engineers as to their qualifications for the duties they wanted to discharge. Now, that is something that is done over and over again. It is not as to this alone, but it is in a multitude of things. I can not now call to mind all these things specifically. This is current law and has been for years, and it has been found to work well.

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. ADAIR. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask the gentleman whether or not this board of examiners are in the employ of the Government and perform other service than this, or whether or not this is all the service they perform for the Government.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Oh, this is a limited salary; this is incidental, I take it, like many other boards.

Mr. ADAIR. They draw a salary, and this is incidental.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Then they draw a salary; yes.

Mr. ADAIR. In some other branch of the Government?

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Yes; they may.

The Clerk read as follows:

Department of insurance: For superintendent of insurance, $3,000; examiner, $1,500; statistician, $1,500; clerk, $1,000; stenographer, $600; temporary clerk hire, $1,200; appraisers, $600; in all, $9,400.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 15, in lines 5 and 6, strike out "appraisers, $600; in all, nine thousand four," and insert "in all, eight thousand eight."

Mr. PERKINS. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Assuredly, on this matter.

Mr. PERKINS. What is this department of insurance? Why is it necessary in this city to have a department of insurance?

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. It is necessary to have a department of insurance for precisely the same reason that the State of New York, the State of Michigan, and every other State has a department of insurance. It is one of the anomalies of the city government that we have State functions, county functions, and municipal functions all under one head.

Mr. PERKINS. Then the function of this department is to superintend the insurance companies who are allowed to do business in the District of Columbia?

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. That is the way I understand it.

Mr. BURLESON. No company is permitted to do business in the District of Columbia without a permit.

Mr. PERKINS. It is like a State, as I understand.

Mr. GOULDEN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman one or two questions. What are the revenues derived from the various insurance companies to this particular department?

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. We did not go into that at this time.

Mr. GOULDEN. I ask that because I have another question to follow it. Are they equal to the amount appropriated by this item, viz, the cost of maintaining this necessary and useful department?

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Very much in excess.

Mr. GOULDEN. Then does the gentleman consider the salary paid to the superintendent, who is a very efficient and competent man, and who in any State in the Union would obtain a much larger salary—has your committee given due consideration to this question of increasing his salary?

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. The committee has considered that not only this year, but other years, and while he is a very efficient man, it was thought best not to increase his salary this year; but I can assure the gentleman that if the Members who are now on the subcommittee should be on there next year this matter will be given very careful consideration, with a view of increasing his salary.

Mr. GOULDEN. I am very glad to hear that, because I know it would be an act of common justice to pay that man $5,000 instead of the paltry sum of $3,000 paid him. I know from long experience in the business and my knowledge of the gentleman that he is justly entitled to this consideration. In the hearings I find that Commissioner Macfarland, speaking of the present incumbent, says:

He has made, I may say, a very successful administration under great difficulties, because of lack of help.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word in order to ask the gentleman a question. As I understand, there are some funds paid to the District by the insurance companies?

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Yes, sir.

Mr. MANN. Those are covered into what fund in the Treasury?

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Into the District fund; they are a part of the revenues of the District.

Mr. MANN. So that we pay half the expense of maintaining the department which, in order to sustain itself, collects a certain amount of money, but all the money it collects is paid in on one side—that is, the District side—and the more money we collect the more it costs the General Government.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Yes; I think——

Mr. MANN. Necessarily.

Mr. BURLESON. Not necessarily; because they are indebted to the Government, because we want to make them pay.

Mr. MANN. Indebtedness is one thing, and an appropriation is another.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. I think there are other instances of that kind. As a matter of fact, I will say to the gentleman from Illinois that the Government is exceedingly generous toward the District.

Mr. MANN. Well, I was not discussing that end of it. I was trying to ascertain what the policy was. Here is a provision in the bill about automobile tags. The General Government pays half the expense of making automobile tags. It then deals them out and collects pay for them, but does that come back to reimburse the General Government? Not a nickel of it. It comes back as profit to the District government to relieve the people of the District of Columbia of taxation, and it seems to me it is an utterly unfair appropriation and not in accordance with the agreement between the United States and the District of Columbia.

Mr. VREELAND. Of course the gentleman knows this committee has no authority to change that. That is a legislative function with which this committee is not charged.

Mr. MANN. Well, I am not sure whether it is a legislative function or not. I am not so certain but the gentlemen could report that all of that money should be paid, and I think they could; that all the expense of the insurance department should be paid out of the receipts of that office, and that all of the expenses of the automobile tax should be paid out of the receipts for automobile tax.

Mr. VREELAND. It would all be subject to a point of order, and so we would have to bring it in some day when the gentleman was not in his seat.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I had thought I was fairly well posted on points of order, but that is one the gentleman has taught me. I had not discovered before that an appropriation providing that the expenditure should be used to reimburse the appropriation was subject to a point of order. It may be.

Mr. VREELAND. The gentleman, of course, knows that the law at present fixes the relations between the Government and the District, and the amount which each must pay?

Mr. MANN. Well, why does the gentleman put it in his appropriation bill?

Mr. VREELAND. Put what in?

Mr. MANN. That half of this shall be paid by the General Government and half by the District of Columbia. If it is the law without being in the bill, why is it put in the bill?

Mr. VREELAND. It is the law whether it is in the bill or not.

Mr. MANN. It is an agreement which is in nowise binding and never was intended to cover items like this.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I think it is a statute.

Mr. MANN. Oh, yes; I understand.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Statutory law. It is not simply an agreement, but "it is in the bond."

Mr. MANN. But not required. It does not affect this appropriation. The mere fact that you offer an item to this bill that was stricken out of the urgent deficiency bill for the payment of a certain amount of money for the District of Columbia, without saying one-half of it shall be paid by the District and one-half by the General Government, I am inclined to think is not subject to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] has expired. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For keeping the library open fifty-two Sundays from 2 o'clock p. m. to 9 o'clock p. m., five holidays from 9 o'clock a. m. to 9 o'clock p. m., and for extra services three hours on Saturday afternoons during July, August, and September, $1,700.

Mr. STAFFORD. I reserve a point of order for the purpose of asking for information as to the reason the committee recommended the change of the hour of closing on Sundays from 10 o'clock, as provided in the bill last year, to 9 o'clock, as provided in the pending bill? Personally, I believe that no person who wishes to have the opportunity of utilizing the libraries in the evening can get down to real solid work after the evening meal before 8 o'clock, and that the extra hour to 10 o'clock is as beneficial as any of the prior hours of the day.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. In reply, Mr. Chairman, I would say that this was recommended by the library board, and conforms also to the hours on secular days. We took the recommendation of the board in this matter. Experience seems to have taught that it was the wise thing to do.

Mr. STAFFORD. Then, on week days no part of the library is open after 9 o'clock in the evening? I believe that in the reference rooms the students can only do good work in the hours between 8 and 10, especially if they are obliged to work in the Departments or at other work, and that additional hour is of great value to them, and it is the rule for hours in our Congressional reading room. The reading room there is open until 10 o'clock on Sunday. Perhaps the librarians, with due regard to those in their employ, would like to close the library an hour earlier, but I believe for the benefit of the patrons of the library it should be kept open until 10 o'clock.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. I do not know what the librarian's views are personally. We accepted the judgment of the board in that matter.

Mr. STAFFORD. I withdraw the point of order, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. ADAIR. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I would like to ask the gentleman from Michigan, the chairman of the committee, if in view of the shortening of the hours there was any change made in the salaries of any of the employees of the library, or whether they receive the same compensation for their services as they did before?

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Not on that account. We had to exercise a good deal of determination not to increase the salaries in scarcely any instance, in this as in other boards. The pleading was for an increase. Hence, we did not feel justified in cutting down the salaries because they did not work one more hour on Sunday.

Mr. ADAIR. You thought it better to cut down the time rather than cut down the salary?

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. That did not enter into the consideration.

Mr. ADAIR. But cutting down the time did not amount to cutting down the salary?

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. That is correct.

The Clerk read as follows:

Miscellaneous, free public library: For purchase of books, $7,500.

Mr. PERKINS. I move to strike out the last word. I would like to ask why the committee put the limit for the purchase of books of $7,500 and what was the amount asked for by the librarian.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. The amount asked for was $15,000.

Mr. PERKINS. Does not the gentleman think that in declining to follow the suggestion of the librarian he, perhaps, exercised undue economy?

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. No, sir.

Mr. PERKINS. Seven thousand five hundred dollars to buy new books; and this is a great city, where the entire budget is $9,000,000. This is a very small amount in all this great sum.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Well, the gentleman must remember that a great many books may be bought for $7,500. I have the impression that the average cost is not over $1 each. There is a building that will stand for the centuries. They have been asking $15,000 a year from the beginning. The committee has gradually raised it up to $7,500. It gave that last year and the year before. Now, personally, and so far as I know, the committee believes that a better selection can be made ultimately by not appropriating such large sums, buying with greater discrimination; and because of that, $7,500 a year—which has been the appropriation now for two consecutive years, and, if this bill carries will make three—will gradually build up a large library there.

Mr. PERKINS. I must say, Mr. Chairman, that I can not agree with the gentleman in charge of the bill. In the first place, the books they are to buy should be good books and proper books, books of permanent value, and the price will average more than $1 a volume. In the second place, in the purchasing of many books it is necessary to have a number of copies, where they are current books, and one copy would be utterly inadequate. Sometimes they will have to have five, ten, or fifteen copies; and I do trust that the committee will yield to the demand for money that has been made upon them for this purpose, which is an entirely reasonable and proper demand, and a very small sum compared to the whole budget, and will make a proper increase for the purpose of buying reading material for the people of this city.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. I am sure the committee will consider it.

The Clerk read as follows:

CONTINGENT AND MISCELLANEOUS EXPENSES.

For contingent expenses of the government of the District of Columbia, namely: For printing, checks, books, law books, books of reference and periodicals, stationery; detection of frauds on the revenue; repairs of market houses; surveying instruments and implements; drawing materials; binding, rebinding, repairing, and preservation of records; maintaining and keeping in good order the laboratory and apparatus in the office of the inspector of asphalt and cement; damages; livery, purchase, and care of horses and carriages or buggies not otherwise provided for; horseshoeing; ice, repairs to pound and vehicles, use of bicycles by inspectors in the engineer department not to exceed $500, and other general necessary expenses of District offices, including the sinking-fund office, Board of Charities, excise board, personal-tax board, harbor master, health department, surveyor's office, sealer of weights and measures' office, and department of insurance, and purchase of new apparatus and laboratory equipment in office of inspector of asphalt and cement, $35,000; and the Commissioners shall so apportion this sum as to prevent a deficiency therein: Provided, That horses and vehicles appropriated for in this act shall not be used by the Commissioners for any other purpose than to visit such points within the District of Columbia as it may be necessary to visit in order to enable them to inspect or inform themselves concerning any public work or property belonging to the said District or to do any other act necessary to the administration of its affairs.

Mr. MURPHY. I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking the gentleman in charge of the bill for a little information in relation to the matter mentioned in lines 4, 5, and 6, "The care of horses and carriages or buggies not otherwise provided for." I would like to ask the gentleman to give us information, if he will, what horses, buggies, and carriages this applies to, and how many, if he has the information at hand?

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. There are a good many of these different boards. Each inspector must have a horse to go about the city. The Commissioners must have horses to go about, if we do not get them automobiles. It is simply to economize time, and it is good administration to furnish these, with proper restrictions, which the committee has sought to do; and I may say further that this is simply current law.

Mr. MURPHY. I understand that, Mr. Chairman; but I would like to know how many horses there are kept, if the gentleman can give us the information?

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. I can not give that. It is another one of those matters of infinite detail we can not go into. You must trust these men on the various boards that they will not abuse the privilege. They are restricted by law, within certain limitations, and if they do abuse the privilege they subject themselves to punishment.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman in charge of the bill a question for information. I wish to inquire if the committee has considered the advisability of more carefully itemizing the appropriations instead of lumping so much of it into one sum? I notice, for example, appropriations for $35,000, apparently intended to carry a very large number of items which precede in the bill, and yet, so far as the wording of the bill itself is concerned, I do not see any reason why the entire amount could not be spent for ice, for example, or for——

Mr. MURPHY. I must object to the gentleman making a speech in my time.

Mr. SCOTT. I beg the gentleman's pardon. I thought the gentleman had yielded the floor.

Mr. MURPHY. I had not. I desire to ask some further questions of the chairman of the committee. If he has the information, I think we are entitled to know; and the gentleman is very courteous in giving it. I would like to ask what is meant by this proviso: "That horses and vehicles appropriated for in this act shall not be used by the Commissioners for any other purpose than to visit such points within the District of Columbia as it may be necessary to visit," and so forth?

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. The Commissioners have their official duties to perform. These horses and carriages are intended for their use in the performance of such official duties, and not for the social recreation of themselves or their families or their friends.

Mr. MURPHY. I thank the gentleman for the information.

Mr. SCOTT. Now, Mr. Chairman, if I may have the floor for a moment, I should like to repeat my inquiry. The gentleman perhaps remembers what it was.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. It is as to whether or not all these things should be itemized.

Mr. SCOTT. Yes.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. That is another of those cases where even the heads of the Departments can not itemize exactly. For instance, take the matter of ice. The heated term may be longer one season than another, contingencies may arise where there will be a variation from the estimates, and more ice may be demanded one season than another. Or, for instance, take coal. You can not specify exactly how many tons of coal will be used by the District government, and there must be an appropriation approximately meeting that demand.

Mr. SCOTT. Then the gentleman's experience as a member of the Committee on Appropriations has been such as to lead him to the conclusion that there are certain items in an appropriation bill for which it is impossible to make a specific appropriation and that certain lump-sum appropriations are necessary in every appropriation bill, even when it is most carefully and skillfully drawn?

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Yes.

Mr. PAYNE. I should like to ask the gentleman from Kansas what his experience has been in reference to the agricultural appropriation bill.

Mr. SCOTT. My experience thoroughly bears out that of the gentleman from Michigan.

The Clerk read as follows:

No part of the money appropriated by this act shall be used for the payment of premiums or other cost of fire insurance.

Mr. GOULDEN. I move to strike out the last word. I should like to ask the gentleman in charge of the bill what is the meaning of that. I do not understand it and I would like to have an explanation. I refer to the provision that no part of the money appropriated by this act shall be used for the payment of premiums or other cost of fire insurance.

Mr. MANN. It seems to me it is worded very plainly. The Government is its own insurer.

Mr. GOULDEN. What is the reason or purpose of putting those words there?

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Some years ago the insurance companies cornered the market on the District of Columbia business, raising the rate a very large per cent. It was decided after careful investigation, going over a long series of years, that, judging the future by the past, if the amount proposed to be exacted by the insurance companies was paid, it would cost more for insurance than we would likely lose by fire if we were not insured. Therefore the District followed the example of the Federal Government and it now carries no insurance.

Mr. GOULDEN. I understand it now, Mr. Chairman, and agree with the purpose of it if the charges were exorbitant or if a trust existed. When reading it I could not understand its relevancy. As it is existing law, I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the erection of suitable tablets to mark historical places in the District of Columbia, to be expended under the direction of the Joint Committee on the Library, the appropriations made for this purpose by the acts of June 27, 1906, and March 2, 1907, respectively, are continued available for the service of the fiscal year 1909.

Mr. SCOTT. I move to strike out the last word, in order that I may ask a question about this appropriation. I notice that the appropriations made for this purpose by the acts of June 27, 1906, and March 2, 1907, respectively, are continued available for the service of the fiscal year 1909. How does it happen that these appropriations have not been expended during the past two years?

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, after the first appropriation was made the matter of selecting designs for tablets was referred to the Joint Committee on the Library. Now, two appropriations of $500 each have been made. That committee has not yet determined upon a design; at least it has not reported. So the committee thought best to leave the $1,000 already appropriated stand until we know what they are going to do, what they are going to expend it for, before making any further appropriation.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, simply to ask a question for information. In line 1, page 20, there is a provision for rent of office for department of insurance for July, 1908, $70. I understood the chairman of the subcommittee that the District carries no insurance upon any of its property. If such is the case, what is this charge for office rent for an insurance department?

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. I think the gentleman did not hear what I said when I explained a few moments ago that the District has its insurance department, the same as any State in the Union has an insurance department. That insurance department must have quarters in which to do business.

Mr. ADAIR. If no insurance is carried on the property of the District, what is the need of an insurance department?

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. For precisely the same reason that the gentleman's State of Indiana needs an insurance department. It looks to conserving the property owners in that the insurance companies that propose to do business here shall be what they represent themselves to be—solvent.

Mr. ADAIR. That is the information that I wanted.

The Clerk read as follows:

IMPROVEMENTS AND REPAIRS.

Elimination of grade crossings: Toward carrying out the provisions of the acts of Congress providing for the elimination of grade crossings and the construction of a union railroad station in the District of Columbia, approved February 12, 1901, and February 28, 1903, for purchase or condemnation of the land necessary for the plaza and new streets, and for reconstructing, grading, and paving, together with the necessary incidental work in connection therewith, the streets, avenues, and ways changed in line or grade or newly created under the provisions of said acts, including the employment on the approval of this act of special assistant counsel, at a rate not to exceed $3,000 per annum, and one clerk, at a rate not to exceed $1,000 per annum, in connection with the settlement of claims for damages incident to changes of grade, this sum to be expended under the provisions of said acts, and to continue available until expended, $100,000.

The foregoing appropriation shall be available to develop, as a property yard for the use of the District of Columbia, and for other municipal purposes, so much of reservation No. 117 lying south of the toe of slope of standard roadbed betwen the portal of the Virginia avenue tunnel and the east end of the south abutment of the New Jersey Avenue Bridge, and south of the south abutment of the New Jersey Avenue Bridge and east of the toe of slope on the west side of the embankment carrying the approach to the New Jersey Avenue Bridge, when the Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington Railroad shall release and convey to the Commissioners of the District of Columbia all right and title to the above-described portion of said reservation which the said company may have been granted by the acts of Congress providing for the elimination of grade crossings and the construction of a union station in the District of Columbia, approved February 12, 1901, and February 28, 1903, or by any other act.

For completing the construction of fountains, lamp-posts, and other structures on the plaza in front of the new union railroad station, in accordance with plans to be approved by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, $50,000, said sum to be expended under the provisions of existing law regarding the elimination of grade crossings and appropriations made therefor: Provided, That the total cost to the United States and the District of Columbia shall not exceed $100,000: And provided further, That the Washington Terminal Company, its successors or assigns, shall defray the cost of so much of these constructions as lie within the limits of its present property north of Massachusetts avenue.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on that paragraph. I would like to have the gentleman in charge of the bill explain it.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. The situation in reference to this case is as follows: The Pennsylvania system, in changing its tracks on account of the new Union Station, found two little flatiron pieces of land a little distance beyond the entrance into the tunnel going under the Office Building. They really have no use for those pieces, and they propose to rededicate them to the District of Columbia without cost. The District Commissioners propose to make property yards of them, and they will serve an excellent purpose, and your committee believe that it is simply a good business proposition to accept both tracts.

Mr. MANN. How near is the Office Building?

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. It is beyond the entrance to the tunnel, and most of it is beyond the bridge on New Jersey avenue going over the railroad—the subway there. It will in no way affect the Office Building, and will not be seen from it at any time. The committee went there and looked it over, and were united in the opinion that it was a good proposition.

Mr. MANN. What compensation or return does the railroad company get for conveying this to the District of Columbia?

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. It is marvelous to say that we looked for the traditional party in the wood pile and couldn't find him anywhere. [Laughter.]

Mr. MANN. This has no relation to the maintenance of tracks into the navy-yard in violation of law and no reference to the maintenance of the shed in the Mall?

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Not in the least; we could find nothing whatever. Major Morrow said in the hearing:

> The sidings are not in here, and we will have to lay them for our service; that will be the consideration for which we will secure this property yard, which will be most useful to us. It will require no crossings of streets or other highways at grade.

Mr. MANN. I accept the gentleman's statement in full faith, although it seems too marvelous to believe.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Previous to investigation, it did to the committee.

The Clerk read as follows:

> Assessment and permit work: For assessment and permit work, $160,000.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I would like to ask the gentleman in charge of the bill what is the meaning of "assessment and permit work, $160,000?" What does that cover? There are afterwards appropriations for work on streets and various classes of improvement made specifically.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. There is a law that people who are asking for the laying of sewers under certain limitations, the laying of pavements in alleys, and the laying of sidewalks shall be assessed half to the property owners, and this is for that work.

Mr. PERKINS. Is it not a fact that a large proportion of the improvements—streets, sewers, and so forth—are paid entirely by the public and there is no local assessment?

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. That is right.

Mr. PERKINS. For improving the highways and laying the asphalt pavement in the highways, that is ordinarily paid entirely by the District without any local assessment?

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. That is as I understand it.

Mr. PERKINS. Does the gentleman think that is a judicious procedure? Improvements are asked by those who want them and are not required to pay any part of the expense?

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. My opinion, after some years of service on the committee, is that it is not a good thing.

Mr. PERKINS. I entirely agree with the gentleman.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. It is a good thing for the District, but not a good thing for the Government.

Mr. PERKINS. Very many improvements are asked for and made which would not be made if some portion of the expense was to be defrayed by those who get the benefit of it.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. That is true, but we have to take the law as we find it in making the appropriations, and not as we think it ought to be.

Mr. PERKINS. I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

Mr. MANN. May I ask the gentleman in reference to this item. I was told by some gentleman who lives here in this District that this item was for the purpose of having the General Government advance the money for, say, sewers that are to be constructed by special assessment; I think myself that he is mistaken, but I would like to know.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. I do not so understand it, and even if it were advanced, the Government would recoup, but I think it does not advance it.

Mr. MANN. Of course, under this item, if the Government advanced it, the Government is out that much.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. I am informed that it is payable in three installments, and becomes in the meantime a lien on the abutting property and bears interest at 5 per cent.

Mr. MANN. That is the assessment.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Has this anything to do with the money that is paid by property owners, or is this simply a contribution made by the Government toward the cost of the work, the other portion of which is paid by the property owners, by special assessment?

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. This is the Government's portion, I suppose.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. One half will be paid by the Government, I should say, and the property owners would of course pay the other.

Mr. BURLESON. The property is assessed for one-half of the remaining sum, which is covered into the Treasury.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Yes; as I understand it.

The Clerk read as follows:

> For paving roadways under the permit system, $10,000.

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking the gentleman in charge of the bill what is meant by lines 9 and 10, "for paving roadways under the permit system, $10,000." Does that relate to where parties have a permit to dig up the pavements for putting in gas lines or lines of any kind, for putting that pavement back? It is usual in other cites to require them to do that for themselves.

Mr. MANN. That is not what it provides for.

Mr. MURPHY. I would like to ask the gentleman in charge of the bill if he can state what it is for?

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. I understand that this is to do just what the gentleman from New York [Mr. PERKINS] intimated ought to be done a few moments ago, where you get out where the people are anxious for the improvements and are willing to pay for them, and they pay one-half of the cost under this system.

Mr. MURPHY. And this is the half the Government is to pay. Is that what is meant by the permit system?

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. I explained that just a few moments ago at length.

Mr. MURPHY. I do not so understand that, Mr. Chairman, but if that is the correct explanation, I accept the explanation of the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn.

The Clerk read as follows:

> Under appropriations contained in this act no contract shall be made for making or relaying asphalt pavement at a higher price than $1.80 per square yard for a quality equal to the best laid in the District of Columbia prior to July 1, 1886, and with same depth of base, nor more than $1.80 per square yard for laying standard asphalt block pavement equal to the best laid in the District of Columbia prior to July 1, 1904: Provided, That these conditions as to price and depth of base shall not apply to those streets on which, in the judgment of the Commissioners, by reason of heavy traffic, poor foundation, or other causes, a pavement of more than ordinary strength is required, in which case the limit of price may be increased to $2 per square yard.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking a question. I notice that the language of this paragraph provides that not to exceed $1.80 per square yard shall be paid for a quality of asphalt pavement equal to the best laid in the District of Columbia prior to July 1, 1886. I should like to inquire why that date is fixed?

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. At that date the standard pavement was fixed. At that time it was determined what constitutes a standard pavement, and it dates back to that. They base their estimates upon that.

Mr. SCOTT. A standard was fixed by way of specifications and plans that are still on file?

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Yes; and all that appertains to a first-class pavement.

Mr. SCOTT. I did not know but what it was a standard of pavement, a particularly good pavement, that had been laid prior to that time, under the law, for instance, in 1880, and that subsequent pavements should come up to that standard. If such were the case, I thought it might be possible that nobody would be available now for the use of the street service who would remember the kind of pavement that we made in 1886, and the committee ought to be fixing a standard a little later in the century.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. The specifications may be the same now that they were then.

Mr. VREELAND. It is a question of formula.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Has there been any improvement in this pavement since 1886, in quality? There have been in most kinds of material and street improvements.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. The theory of this provision of the law is that it will not fall below the standard measure of excellence required. It may go beyond that, but the formula must be at least equal in its requirements to that upon which the standard pavement is based.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. That comes as near practical perfection as any standard, I suppose, that is known here.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Yes.

Mr. FORNES. At the prices named, is there any guarantee given as to the length of wear this pavement shall give?

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. The guarantee time limit of good construction is five years of service.

Mr. PAYNE. I would like to ask the gentleman what harm there could be in changing that date about twenty years and putting it 1906, so if there had been any better pavement laid in the meantime or up to that date we could get the benefit of it.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Well, I will answer the gentleman. As I stated a while ago, we will investigate and see if there has been any improvement and report in our next bill if we are on the committee.

Mr. PAYNE. This has been carried for twenty years at that particular date, and if there has been any improvement in the pavement since that time the contractor is not required to come to the higher standard, if there has been a higher standard fixed since then, and I do not see any harm in changing the date.

Mr. VREELAND. There is no formula for 1906.

Mr. PAYNE. This does not say anything about a formula.

Mr. VREELAND. That is the meaning of it. The standard means a formula.

Mr. PAYNE. It says "pavement of the best standard." I think the committee ought to look into it before they bring in another bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Delaware avenue NE., from B street to C street, $8,500.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I would just like to ask whether the bill provides for pavement around the new Office Building?

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Yes; that is exactly what we are reading now. Much of the pavement there is poor, and the other is block pavement, which can be used to great advantage elsewhere.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I would like to ask the gentleman if they use anything like the bithulitic asphalt?

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. I did not hear the gentleman.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I asked the gentleman if they had used anything here like the bithulitic asphalt, which is quite an improvement on the old asphalt, that has been talked of and read about. I will say to my friend that my information is, from what other people have told me and what I have seen in my own city, that bithulitic asphalt is a great improvement on the other asphalt. It has been used in my city with great success. It wears well and is easily made, and I think, possibly, it is cheaper than the old asphalt.

My friend from Missouri [Mr. BOOHER] tells me it is a great deal cheaper, and I know it makes a beautiful street, easily made with crushed rock and tar and a little water and a whole lot of pressing, and so forth, and I know it has worked well in Nashville.

The Clerk read as follows:

Condemnation of streets, roads, and alleys: For purchase or condemnation of streets, roads, and alleys, $1,000.

Mr. OLCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking the gentleman a question. I would like to ask what that means—$1,000 for condemnation of streets, roads, and alleys. Does it refer to some particular road or alley? It is so small an amount of money that I merely wanted to know what it meant.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, in reply to that question I will say that the courts have held that before condemnation proceedings can be taken there must be some appropriation available, and this is to comply with that.

Mr. OLCOTT. I withdraw the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows

For suburban sewers, $75,000. And the Commissioners of the District of Columbia are hereby authorized to construct service sewers in Conduit road and levy assessments for the same under the conditions prescribed in the act of April 22, 1904, entitled "An act authorizing the laying of water mains and service sewers in the District of Columbia."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order on that paragraph. May I ask what is the jurisdiction over the Conduit road now? Has that point been determined?

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. I think it is Federal jurisdiction.

Mr. MANN. I understand that; but who has jurisdiction over it?

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. The War Department, as I understand it.

Mr. MANN. It has not been turned over to the District Commissioners?

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. No; I do not so understand it.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Commissioners of the District of Columbia are hereby authorized and directed to acquire, by purchase or condemnation, a right of way for a trunk sewer in the valley lying north of the proposed line of T street and south of the Naval Observatory grounds, from Wisconsin avenue to Rock Creek, the cost of said right of way and of the sewer to be laid therein to be charged to the appropriation for suburban sewers for the fiscal year 1908.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order upon that paragraph.

Mr. OLCOTT. I was going to make the point of order against that paragraph; I do make a point of order against the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York makes a point of order against the paragraph.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. I hope the gentleman will reserve the point of order.

Mr. OLCOTT. I reserve the point of order with great pleasure.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I would like to give the committee the information on that point. Out toward the Naval Observatory a gentleman lives in a very fine place, and to the rear or back of his home runs a ravine from the vicinity of Wisconsin avenue for some distance toward Connecticut avenue. The Commissioners undertook to lay a sewer in that ravine following the line of least resistance. Instead of following T street proposed and cutting very deep, as they will have to in places in order to lay the sewer, they can lay it at a much less expense in the depression and at the same time serve the property owners as they would if they laid it in the street.

Mr. MANN. Has the gentleman ever been on this ground himself?

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Only by the residence where this gentleman lives. Now, I was going to say——

Mr. MANN. I have walked over it frequently.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. You have? I have not, I must confess. This is one of the things I have not personally investigated. I was simply giving it from the standpoint of the Commissioners as represented to the committee. I will read here, if you will permit me:

Among the sewers for which the appropriation for suburban sewers for the fiscal year 1908 was intended to provide was the trunk sewer referred to above—

That is this one under consideration—and a portion of such appropriation has been set aside for the purpose. The Commissioners filed a suit in the supreme court of the District of Columbia for the condemnation of a right of way for this sewer.

I think all have given the right of way except this one individual; at least, I was so informed.

Mr. MANN. What other people are involved?

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. A number of them. I will read:

Under the general authority contained in the Code of Law for the District of Columbia authorizing them to secure rights of way for sewers when the same were authorized by act of Congress. Objection was made by the owners of property through which this right of way was to be secured and said parties filed a suit to enjoin the condemnation of the right of way. Within the last few days the court has decided that the Commissioners had no authority to secure this right of way, as this sewer was not specifically appropriated for by Congress and no appropriation was made for the right of way.

Those objections raised by the court have been met in this bill.

This is an important sewer and the Commissioners desire to construct it at once, but in order to meet the objections of the court it is necessary to have specific authority to acquire the right of way and to make the general appropriation for suburban sewers applicable for the payment of the cost of such right of way.

Mr. MANN. Now, could the gentleman say what is the importance of this sewer? There is no population there?

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Beyond, up on Wisconsin avenue, it serves people, does it not, in that vicinity? It is to be a large trunk sewer.

Mr. MANN. It may serve one house. I think there are no other houses there. This sewer does not run through a whole lot of different people's property. It runs through one park. I judge it may be owned by a dozen people, for all I know, but I think not. It will be absolutely of no value whenever the property is developed. It will run right under the homes whenever it is developed there—run right under the houses.

Now, is it proposed out of the general fund to build a large sewer right where houses will eventually be built, solely for the benefit of one individual? It seems like a remarkable proposition to me.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. It would be a remarkable proposition if it were true.

Mr. MANN. Well, what else would it serve?

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. If I may say to the gentleman, this is simply one of a number of sewers that anticipate the development of the city.

Mr. MANN. Well, it anticipates it so long ahead of the time necessary. This property on the westerly or southwesterly side of Massachusetts avenue there is very much like the property on the other side which they now want to have added to Rock Creek Park—a suitable piece of property for that addition. Now, they propose to run a sewer, not where the street will run, but right where homes will be built, if it ever is developed.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Well, Mr. Chairman, in reply to the gentleman's suggestion, I would say this: That we have here the report of the Engineer Commissioner and the associate Commissioners, who are charged under the law with the construction of a system of sewerage that will serve not simply the immediate, but the prospective needs of the District, and if we can not——

Mr. OLCOTT. Will the gentleman yield for a moment?

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Let me finish this sentence. And if we can not rely on the judgment of the Engineer Commissioner touching this matter as to whether it is properly located and whether it will affect the future building of homes, I do not know upon whom we can rely for information.

Mr. OLCOTT. Does the gentleman know that the Supreme Court, in an opinion recently delivered, has stated that the condemnation or expense of condemnation for a new sewer can not be taken from a general appropriation for sewers?

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. I have just read the decision here.

Mr. OLCOTT. I did not hear the gentleman.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. And the comments upon it. I stood with my face the other way.

Mr. OLCOTT. I would say that I have no wish to embarrass the committee by insisting on my point of order. But this sewer is to go through private property, and I recognize the advantage of going through the line of least resistance. If the gentleman and the committee are willing to accept an amendment making provision that the trunk sewer shall be laid within the limits of the streets, existing and proposed, and according to the plans authorized by Congress, I am perfectly willing to withdraw my point of order, but otherwise I shall be obliged to make it.

Mr. MANN. I would not want to accept that proposition. I make the point of order whether the committee accept the amendment or not.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman makes the point of order.

Mr. MANN. On line 25, page 30, ending in line 7, page 31.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has no doubt the paragraph is subject to the point of order, and therefore sustains it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Disposal of city refuse: For the collection and disposal of garbage and dead animals; miscellaneous refuse and ashes from private residences in the city of Washington and the more densely populated suburbs; for collection and disposal of night soil in the District of Columbia, and for the payment of necessary inspection, livery of horses, and incidental expenses, $179,945.

Mr. KELIHER. I move to strike out the last word. I would like to ask the gentleman in charge of the bill whether here in the District any part of the refuse is removed by private contract?

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. The Commissioners have it removed under private contract.

Mr. KELIHER. Then the work is all done under the direct supervision of the Commissioners?

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. This simply follows the contract already made, and carries the appropriation for it.

Mr. KELIHER. What I want to get at is, does the working force of the department of the city or the District of Columbia remove the refuse itself, or is that let out at private contract?

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. It is done by private contract.

Mr. MANN. It is done by private contract now? For a while it was done by the District this winter; and done abominably, by the way.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. It is done by private contract.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the parking commission: For contingent expenses, including laborers, cart hire, trees, tree boxes, tree stakes, tree straps, planting and care of trees on city and suburban streets, whitewashing, care of trees, tree spaces, and miscellaneous items, $30,000.

Mr. MANN. I desire to offer an amendment on the top of the page. Line 1, page 33, after the word "straps"——

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. I reserve the point of order. I would like to hear the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will please send his amendment to the Clerk's desk.

Mr. MANN. I am not able to send it to the Clerk's desk. I will reserve the point of order upon the paragraph.

Mr. VREELAND. It is too late for that.

Mr. MANN. I have not offered my amendment yet.

Mr. VREELAND. You have not sent it in writing to the Clerk's desk.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman make the point of order that I did not send the amendment to the Clerk's desk?

Mr. VREELAND. The Chairman made the point of order that you had not sent it to the desk.

Mr. MANN. I will reserve the point of order upon the paragraph.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I suggest it is too late, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. MANN. Why?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Because the gentleman has proposed an amendment.

Mr. MANN. I have not had chance to offer it yet.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I think the objection was made here as to the manner in which you proposed the amendment; and I think it is clearly too late to make the point of order.

Mr. MANN. I would have been very happy to have had an opportunity to state my amendment.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I think that there will be no objection to that.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. There was no objection; I simply raised the point of order.

Mr. MANN. I do not see how the gentleman could raise the point of order on an amendment which was not offered.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I suggest that the gentleman offer his amendment and then the Chair can determine.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman was too hasty about making the point of order on an amendment which had not been offered.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Go ahead.

Mr. MANN. The amendment I want to offer is to insert after the word "straps," in line 1, page 33, the words "tree labels."

Mr. PAYNE. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Chairman. The gentleman from Illinois having reserved the point of order against the paragraph, and then offered an amendment, does not the offering of the amendment itself waive his point of order?

Mr. MANN. Undoubtedly, though I would have insisted upon it.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 1, page 33, after the word "straps," insert the words "tree labels."

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. What is the object of the gentleman's amendment?

Mr. MANN. I will say to the gentleman what the object is. It will cost a very small amount of money. There are a number of very fine trees in some of the parks in Washington. There is one little Japanese cherry tree in blossom—a perfect beauty—in Dupont Circle, and a thousand people have asked within the last few days, "What is it?" The cost of the label is comparatively nothing.

We label the trees in the Capitol grounds. We have labeled the trees in the Agricultural grounds, and why should not a few of these rare trees that have been gathered here from all over the world be labeled, so that the people may know what they are, the expense being merely nominal?

Mr. VREELAND. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. VREELAND. Does the gentleman intend to have this system cover all the streets of the city, or merely the parks?

Mr. MANN. This only refers to the parking commission, and I would not intend to have it cover the streets at all. It is not obligatory. This would merely permit the appropriation, and I suppose that the Commissioners have judgment enough to label only unusual and rare trees.

Mr. VREELAND. It simply makes it permissible?

Mr. MANN. Merely permissible.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. The gentleman might add to that that the labels be put on in English. I see a great many of them are in Latin.

Mr. MANN. I think the usual way is to use the proper Latin scientific name, and also the English name.

Mr. BURLESON. It is not the gentleman's idea to label all the trees on a street 2 or 3 miles long, notwithstanding the trees may be of the same species? The gentleman does not intend to have every tree labeled. Surely not.

Mr. MANN. I do not think there is anybody crazy enough, even on that side of the aisle, to do that. I am sure there is not on this side.

Mr. BURLESON. I do not know about that. I suspected there might be when the gentleman offered his amendment. [Laughter.]

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. With the gentleman's explanation, limiting it to rare and unusual trees, I can see no objection to it.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Playgrounds: For completing equipment of outdoor playgrounds, $1,500.

Mr. OLCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 33, line 13, strike out "one thousand five hundred" and insert in lieu thereof "and for their maintenance, ten thousand."

Mr. OLCOTT. I will say in regard to that that we appropriated $75,000 for the purchase of playgrounds last year. We appropriated $5,000 for their maintenance. There was expended on those grounds not only the $5,000 appropriated, but also $8,800 given by an association called the "Children's Playground Association." It seems to me they can not possibly do with less than the sum I have suggested in my amendment for the coming year. There is no object in having these playgrounds, and allowing them to go absolutely to wreck and ruin by not properly maintaining and equipping them. I therefore hope my amendment will prevail.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, this matter was gone into with some degree of thoroughness by the committee. It is not a new thing in principle or practice. It is the old story of beginning an enterprise on the part of benevolent and well-minded people, giving it a start, and then letting hands go, and let our Uncle Samuel get behind and do all the pushing. In other words, what was begun as a benevolent enterprise to-day develops in the minds of those who are back of it into a million-dollar plant, which is proposed for this city for playgrounds. We gave $75,000 last year. They wanted $200,000 this year—$185,000 for grounds only, $5,000 for the improvement of grounds—and the committee believed then, and believe now, that this city does so little compared with other cities for the care of its own people that here is a chance to show its faith by its works. To illustrate, I have been able to find but three endowed beds in the hospitals of this city. There may be more. They come to the Treasurer of the United States instead of going to the people of wealth and asking, as they do in other cities, for their help in the care of this benevolent institution. It has become a standard order of things to start an enterprise and then let the Government take hold of it and carry it on, and this is one of those cases, and the committee felt it was time to call a halt. Let the Congress mark time for twelve months and see what the people will do. Let the people see what they can do themselves before they propose to slack their hands and let the Government do it all. I hope the amendment will not prevail. Give them a chance to do something for themselves for at least twelve months.

Mr. BURLESON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to direct the attention of the committee to some of the legislation heretofore carried in District appropriation bills upon this subject. Three years ago we appropriated for equipment and maintenance of playgrounds $2,000. A year thereafter the word "supervision" crept into the paragraph, and we appropriated for maintenance, supervision, and equipment of playgrounds $10,000. Last year we appropriated for maintenance, supervision, and equipment for playgrounds $5,000, aggregating for the three years $17,000. Of that amount how much do you suppose was expended for supervision, paid out in the way of salaries, some of it to benevolent gentlemen, so pretending, who appeared before the committee for the purpose of advocating the purchase on the part of the General Government and the District of Columbia of playgrounds to cost approximately a million dollars?

How much do you suppose was paid by the constituted authorities of this District from these appropriations of three years for supervision of playgrounds already acquired? Only the modest sum of $10,369.77. What would be the cost for maintenance if we made all the purchases these gentlemen recommend?

After the District of Columbia and the General Government had made the first appropriation of $2,000 for the maintenance and equipment of these playgrounds, some one diverted of that amount, without authority of law, as I contend, the sum of $681 for supervision of playgrounds. The next year, as I have said, the word "supervision" crept into the paragraph. This year we strike it out. Remember, gentleman of the committee, in this bill we provide the school children of this city with free text-books, free writing tablets, free pencils, free ink, free material for sewing schools, free material for the cooking schools; in fact, we keep the spoon of governmental pap in their mouths from the beginning of the school year to the end of it, furnishing everything except food and clothing. Now it is proposed by some people in the District of Columbia, and of course vehemently urged by those who are to benefit as supervisors, that we shall expend a million dollars for playgrounds, and in addition to all else that is being done for them by a beneficent Government, to pay people to supervise the children at play, thus keeping them in leading strings even during the holiday period.

Mr. Chairman, I regret exceedingly that this item of $1,500 for equipment is carried in this bill. These children should be permitted to do something for themselves. I now here submit the question to this intelligent body, When are the children of the District of Columbia to learn the lesson of self-reliance, if they are taught, as is the case from the time they are entered in the public schools until they finish at a business high school, that the Government is to care for them; if they are, as is now proposed, to be encouraged in the belief that even during the period when the school is in recess, that when engaged in their sports the same Government shall provide them with balls, vaulting poles, and swings, which they ought to provide themselves? Now, they do not provide for themselves one single thing used by them in school.

We have, as I have shown, appropriated $17,000 for the maintenance and equipment of playgrounds already established. Of this amount we appropriated $10,000 last year, and stipulated in the bill that it was for completing the equipment of playgrounds. And yet these people are back, insisting that the playgrounds are not yet equipped and asking for more and more. Now, we propose, Mr. Chairman, by this bill, to authorize the expenditure of $1,500 more to complete the equipment, and then your committee thinks that the children of this District ought to be permitted to do as you did when you were boys—supervise, look after their own playgrounds, and hereafter provide themselves with their own playthings. I do hope that this amendment will be voted down.

Mr. OLCOTT. Mr. Chairman, notwithstanding the forceful and virulent argument of the gentleman from Texas, I still believe in free schools and public playgrounds.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that what the gentleman from Texas has said about free schoolbooks, free apparatus, and so forth, for which the law of the District provides, is no argument whatever, Mr. Chairman, why we should not provide the school children of this city with playgrounds.

It may be that the benevolent people who ought to open up their hearts and purse strings have not done as they should, but we ought not to let the blame rest upon the innocent children because others have failed to do what the chairman of the committee thinks is their duty. In practically all the cities, I think, the modern way is to provide the children with schoolbooks and with all the other things and necessary apparatus for the proper education of the children. But that is only one branch of their education, and as far as the perpetuity of the Government and its institutions are concerned, it is not the most important one. If you are going to develop the minds of the children you want good, healthy bodies to carry the minds, in order that they may be prepared for citizenship and for the management of the Government that will speedily be put in their hands. It seems to me that, regardless of what the expense may be, we ought to provide proper facilities for the physical development of the school children by necessary playgrounds. If the committee deem it wise they can put a condition on the appropriation that would require the raising of an additional sum to add to it.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. That is the thing the committee is after.

Mr. NORRIS. But you have not done it in this bill.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. No; not in so many words, but we leave it so that those who have the ability to do it can do it. Let us see if they will meet us halfway.

Mr. NORRIS. The committee could provide in the bill that the money for playgrounds shall not be available until the citizens raise an additional amount to go with it. Let us meet them halfway. It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that the difficulty with this playground proposition is that the men who are opposed to it have forgotten that they themselves were once children, and have forgotten the fact that it is necessary for the proper development of manhood and womanhood that there must be playgrounds for children, and in this city they do not have them. We can not put up dollars and cents against the physical development of the child.

Mr. VREELAND. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. VREELAND. Does my friend understand that the item about which he is talking is not for the purchase of playgrounds?

Mr. NORRIS. I do understand that.

Mr. VREELAND. But for the provision and furnishing of equipment.

Mr. NORRIS. I understand that.

Mr. VREELAND. I do not believe my friend when he was a boy had somebody to teach him how to play games and to watch over him.

Mr. NORRIS. No; but I will say that if my friend the gentleman from New York [Mr. VREELAND] had lived in a city like Washington, it would have been necessary for some one to take care of and watch over him in that respect or he would not be with us here to-day with the fine physique and mind that he possesses.

Mr. VREELAND. We have furnished the playgrounds, we have given the boys the place to play. Now, let them go and play.

Mr. NORRIS. But they do not have a place to play. The children of the Capital City are deprived of the healthful privilege of physical development in the open air. The children of to-day will have the management of affairs to-morrow. The future welfare and happiness of the race depends in a great measure upon the healthful physical development of the children of to-day. Give the child a strong body and you have laid the foundation for a strong and vigorous mind.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Nebraska has expired.

Mr. KELIHER. Mr. Chairman, I want to say to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BURLESON] that in my home city, Boston, we have expended millions on playgrounds, and we are going to spend millions more. A million expended to-day in Washington will save millions to this District in ten or fifteen years from now, because the public-playground proposition has come to stay. I wish the gentleman could go with me to my city and to the crowded, congested sections of it and see lines of little children on Saturday night going into the public baths to receive their baths free at the expense of the city of Boston. That is an institution also that was once decried as a fad, but is now recognized as a fixture; and as Washington grows and land values increase, by spending a few thousand now you will save millions in the not too far future, for by the best minds, practical and progressive, among those who have given thought to this subject—not faddists, not cranks—it is recognized that money invested in public parks is money well spent. The public park and gymnasium idea is going to develop and last and become a fixture in all great municipalities. I welcome the day, and shall vote for any item that will give to the city of Washington that which is inevitably going to be a municipal necessity—playgrounds in the congested sections of the city.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Chairman I wish to speak a word as to the facts in this case, because it does not seem to me that the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BURLESON], although with the very best intentions, has left the House with a full knowledge of the conditions. I am very sorry to be in the attitude of opposing this committee, with which I am generally in entire sympathy. It seems to me in this case, however, that the amendment suggested ought to be adopted. Last year we appropriated $75,000 and bought three playgrounds. One of those three is not now in condition to be equipped. This $1,500 which the bill gives will equip only one of them, and it leaves the second one, which is now ready to be equipped, wholly unfurnished.

Mr. VREELAND. What is the equipment the gentleman wants to furnish?

Mr. GILLETT. It is the swings and sandpits and bars and things of that kind which they say cost about $1,500.

Mr. NORRIS. I would like to ask whether this entire $75,000 has been used?

Mr. GILLETT. I think it has. But the equipment is not expensive. For temporary equipment you can use wooden materials, but it costs about $1,500 to properly equip them permanently; so we need some money for that. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. BURLESON] criticises with much force the expense for supervision, and he also says that the District does nothing. I agree that it is true that there is not much civic pride in the city of Washington, and we are largely responsible for that.

You can hardly expect a city which does not govern itself, whose taxes it has no control over, to develop much civic pride, but at the same time, in the last year, these people, whose civic spirit we are doing all we can to kill, have collected $8,000 for these very playgrounds, and have paid it themselves. So it will be seen there is some public spirit for them, and I have no doubt it will continue. As to this question of salaries, gentlemen must remember that it is not enough to simply provide in a big city like this a lot, and then tell the little children that they can go out there and play. The result of that would be that the biggest boys and the worst boys would get control of the playground and the weak and the small and the timid, the very ones who need it most, would be crowded out.

Mr. VREELAND. Does not the gentleman know that they are providing playgrounds around every schoolhouse in this city for the small children?

Mr. GILLETT. Who is?

Mr. VREELAND. The United States Government is putting in half of it.

Mr. GILLETT. Where is the appropriation for it?

Mr. VREELAND. It is continuing from year to year. Nearly all of them are provided now with playgrounds.

Mr. GILLETT. Oh, the gentleman means just a little bit of a ground around the school?

Mr. VREELAND. I mean playgrounds. Of course I do not mean a big pasture.

Mr. GILLETT. Now, it is a very small and limited ground——

Mr. VREELAND. A place for small children to play.

Mr. GILLETT. But not enough to be a real playground.

Mr. HOLLIDAY. Will the gentleman yield? I would like to know if these playgrounds spoken of here are for the benefit of the school children when attending school or for the benefit of the children during vacation?

Mr. GILLETT. For both school time and vacation. They are open during vacation. Now, what I was going to say was you must have somebody to supervise them. If these playgrounds are to be properly utilized you must have somebody present to supervise the play of the children. It may be true, as the gentleman from Texas says, that he did not have anybody to supervise his play.

I know I did not when I was a boy. Those of us who grew up in the country did not need it. If the big boys take and monopolize one lot, there are plenty others for the small boys. But when you get in a city, with a vicious population and with the habits that some of the larger children have, all experience shows it is indispensable, if you are going to have your playgrounds useful, that you must have them under some sort of supervision. The experience of these big cities all tends to prove that you must have proper and wise supervision—that without it a playground does harm as well as good—and therefore it seems to me it is folly not to appropriate money to supervise them. We have provided playgrounds, and while I am opposed to maintaining them on an elaborate and expensive scale; while I think the sum named in this amendment is unnecessarily large, yet I think we ought to give enough to make sure that the large sums we have invested earn a return in the improved health and morality of the children.

Mr. BENNET of New York and Mr. VREELAND rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York.

Mr. VREELAND. I was about to move that all debate under this paragraph and amendments thereto be closed.

Mr. BURLESON. I would like to have about four minutes.

Mr. VREELAND. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on the pending paragraph and amendments thereto close in ten minutes.

Mr. BENNET of New York. I think I have the floor.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognized the gentleman from New York, a member of the committee.

Mr. VREELAND. I move that all debate close in ten minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York moves that all debate on the pending paragraph and amendments thereto be closed in ten minutes.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

Mr. BENNET of New York. Mr. Chairman, we are most of us country born, and insensibly we are affected by that fact. It is perfectly true, as the gentleman from Texas says, that when we grew up as boys we had no supervision over our sports. When we wanted to play baseball, we had a vacant lot or field to play it in. When we wanted to skate in the winter time, we had a mill pond to skate on. Even when the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. BONYNGE] was born in the city of New York and grew up there to that sturdy manhood which adorns this Chamber to-day, he had vacant lots to play in. And so had my friend the six-foot-two man from the Fifteenth District, Mr. OLCOTT, but there is nothing of that kind in a big city. We have progressed toward that condition, as every big city in the country is progressing, in the knowledge that you must supply places for your children to play and that the best investment you can make is to spend reasonable sums of money for these playgrounds. Every big city has them. You have to keep your children off the streets. We found out ten years ago we had to do that in New York, and we are doing it at an expense of millions, with the result that in the last three months in New York City we had the lowest death rate in the history of the city. It improves the health, it improves the morals, and it improves the population to look after your children.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will allow me, the gentleman would not lead us to believe that children had been using playgrounds in New York in the last three months?

Mr. BENNET of New York. I am talking about the effect that playgrounds have had, but I would not assert, on my own responsibility as a Member, that they have not been using them during that time. I will say——

Mr. SHERLEY. Will the gentleman allow a question?

Mr. BENNET of New York. Certainly.

Mr. SHERLEY. Does the gentleman consider that the conditions in New York City are at all similar, in point of congestion and open-air space, to what they are in Washington, or that they ever will be, no matter how large the District grows?

Mr. BENNET of New York. If the gentleman will walk through the city parks here in Washington and see the "keep off the grass" signs, which he will not find in the city parks of New York, he will find the conditions are worse.

Mr. SHERLEY. Then, I will say to the gentleman, he should offer some proper legislation to abolish the signs; we have plenty of ground.

Mr. TAWNEY. There are none.

Mr. BENNET of New York. There may not be in the winter time——

Mr. KELIHER and several gentlemen rose.

The CHAIRMAN. To whom does the gentleman yield?

Mr. BENNET of New York. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. KELIHER. I would like to ask the gentleman if it is not a fact, bearing upon the question asked by the gentleman from Michigan, that in big cities, such as yours and mine, we utilize the public playgrounds in the winter by flooding them with water, so that the boys and girls can use them in winter for skating, and in consequence there is scarcely a day in the year that these playgrounds are not in use, and in good use.

Mr. BENNET of New York. My colleague from the Eighteenth District [Mr. GOULDEN] nods that it is so, and therefore I know it is so, but not of my own personal knowledge. It is the best investment you can make. Now, the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] asked me if conditions in New York and Washington have any comparison. There are people who say that the conditions in the back alleys and slums of Washington are worse than anything that you can find in Chicago, Boston, or New York. I have not any personal knowledge of it, but I have seen pictures of things within gunshot of this Capitol that are worse than anything I have ever seen in New York City. Give the children of Washington a chance, the same chance we had when we were boys. They have not the vacant lots, the open spaces, and they can not get them unless we give them to them by appropriating their own money and some of the Government's money to do it; and when the people of this city, whose civic pride has been crushed by lack of voting power, have raised $8,000 or $9,000 a year, let us go as far as they go.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I will say that I am with the gentleman on that proposition, but I would like to know if the District is not doing what it can reasonably do in that line? I have a good deal of faith in this committee. Can the gentleman give me any information on that proposition?

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I just want to call attention to the fact that the subject of purchase of playgrounds is not now before the committee. It is a question of whether the Federal Government is going to take over the supervision and management of the playgrounds which Congress has heretofore authorized the purchase of and appropriated the money for. Originally the proposition presented to Congress was to purchase the playgrounds. The benevolent people who were back of that movement gave assurances then that if Congress would appropriate the money for the purchase of these playgrounds, namely, $75,000, they would see to the supervision of the grounds themselves and also provide a part of the equipment.

Mr. GILLETT. Will the gentleman please tell us who made any such proposition?

Mr. TAWNEY. The man who was instrumental in securing the original appropriation in the committee room made the statement himself to me that if the purchase could be made the city would look after the supervision of the grounds, or that the benevolent people of this city would do so.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the committee proposes to go even beyond the original proposition, and provide the necessary equipment for these grounds and provide for supervision, and I do not think that it is at all conducive to that civic pride which the gentleman from Massachusetts referred to a moment ago for Congress to assume also the parental duty of looking after the children when they are occupying and using the playgrounds which Congress has heretofore authorized and purchased. Why, Mr. Chairman, there is no city in the Union where there are as many open spaces for children to occupy as there are in the city of Washington. One of the chief beauties of the city is the park system available for this purpose.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Minnesota yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts?

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Is the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY] aware that there is an ordinance which forbids children over 9 years of age to even skate in the public parks of the city of Washington?

Mr. TAWNEY. On roller skates?

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. On roller skates.

Mr. TAWNEY. If there is a provision of that kind, it is not observed nor is it enforced, because we all know that the children of the city of Washington are not to-day alone occupying the open spaces in this city as playgrounds, but they have invaded the streets and the sidewalks of the city and are using them for skating parks on roller skates.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. TAWNEY. Now, Mr. Chairman, I can not yield, as I have only a minute more. Mr. Chairman, I want to say that our solicitude for the children here in the city of Washington is not only uncalled for, but, in my judgment, is a positive detriment to the children. [Applause.] I want to say, Mr. Chairman, that if the Government, State and National, had been as solicitous for the boys who were boys in our day as it is now in regard to providing and equipping playgrounds for their use, there are many faces here to-day that would not be here now under those conditions. [Applause.] The difficulty to-day is that we are encouraging our children to devote too much time to play. Let us endeavor to encourage in them a disposition to work. Let us endeavor to cultivate in them the love of industry, and you will find they will grow physically as well as mentally; that they will have the physical being to furnish and keep alive that mental energy which is so essential to their success in life. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. Time for debate has been closed by order of the committee.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for one minute to make a statement.

Mr. BURLESON. I will consent to that if you will give me a minute.

Mr. MANN. And give me one, too. [Laughter.]

Mr. TAWNEY. Then I object.

Mr. ROBERTS. I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Minnesota may be extended a minute to answer a question. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is made. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. BURLESON. Mr. Chairman, I ask to embody in the RECORD a letter from the Assistant Engineer Commissioner showing that streets, squares, circles, triangles, and so forth, summed up as the public reservations in this city and Georgetown, amount to 59.7 per cent of the total area, and that—— [Cries of "Regular order!"]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

Mr. MANN. May we have the amendment reported again?

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be again reported.

The amendment was again reported.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. MANN. Division!

The committee divided, and there were—ayes 32, noes 50.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. BURLESON. Mr. Chairman, I think it will be interesting to the members of the committee to see the letters from the Assistant Engineer Commissioner, showing the amount of breathing space we have here and ask permission to embody them in the RECORD without taking the time to read them.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to embody in the RECORD certain letters.

Mr. MANN. I would like to ask if this meets with the approval of the gentleman's leader?

Mr. BURLESON. I have not consulted him.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. If this meets with the approval of the gentleman's leader, I will have no objection.

Mr. BURLESON. He does not seem to object.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The letters are as follows:

OFFICE OF THE ENGINEER COMMISSIONER OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA,
Washington, March 7, 1908.

Hon. A. S. BURLESON,
House of Representatives, United States, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Accompanying please find a map on which is indicated the public reservations within what is known as the city of Washington, as well as a statement of the estimated acreage of streets, avenues, and alleys within the same limits. The map in question was compiled, as you will see, in 1894, since which time I understand there have been some slight changes, such changes, however, as would not materially vary the percentage of reservation acreage to that of the total. The computation has been based upon certain assumptions which may not be actually correct, but are thought to be closely so. The result would indicate that within the city of Washington and Georgetown 59.7 per cent of the total area is devoted to reservation and other public purposes.

Very respectfully,

E. M. MARKHAM,
Captain, Corps of Engineers, United States Army,
Assistant to Engineer Commissioner, District of Columbia.

OFFICE OF THE ENGINEER COMMISSIONER OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA,
Washington, April 1, 1908.

Hon. A. S. BURLESON,
House of Representatives, United States, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Referring to my letter of March 7, 1908, giving the percentage of area within the city of Washington devoted to public purposes, I have the honor to supplement the same by the following, respecting the county and the combination of both county and city, or, in other words, the entire District:

	Acres.
Amount of land not covered by marsh or water outside the city of Washington	30,350
Amount of land in streets, highways, etc., within the same area	2,854
Area of land used for parks and public institutions easily accessible to the public (being all the space shown in green on the accompanying map with the exception of reservoirs, insane asylum, and naval magazine)	3,083
Total (about 20 per cent of the total area)	5,937
Area of reservoirs, insane asylum, and naval magazine, not accessible to public	717

It is to be observed that the highway system of the county is only projected and that it will be a great many years before its completion, but it can be reasonably stated that upon the completion of present highways plans pertaining to the county, the percentage of such highways, streets, and all parks at present in existence in the county will be approximately 35 per cent of this total county area.

Combining the areas of the county and the city, or, in other words, the entire district exclusive of actual water areas and marsh, we have a total acreage of 36,897, and an acreage devoted to streets, alleys, and accessible public reservations of all kinds of 9,846 or 26.7 per cent of the total area. If we include the inaccessible public areas mentioned, namely, the reservoirs, insane asylum, and naval magazine, the acreage of public space will be 10,563 or 28.6 per cent of the total.

Summarizing, it can therefore be stated that the area of public space in the city of Washington to the total area thereof is 59.7 per cent, that the same percentage as applying to the county is 20 per cent, and that the percentage pertaining to the city and county combined—or, in other words, to the entire District—is 26.7 per cent, considering only accessible public areas, or 28.6 per cent, considering public areas both accessible and inaccessible.

I trust that the above data will satisfy your needs in the matter.

Very respectfully,

E. M. MARKHAM,
Captain, Corps of Engineers, United States Army,
Assistant to Engineer Commissioner, District of Columbia.

The Clerk read as follows:

For constructing public-convenience station to be located on public reservation numbered 8 in the city of Washington, $20,000.

Mr. PERKINS. I reserve the point of order on lines 17, 18, and 19. I have no objection to the object; it is a very commendable one, but the cost of $20,000, for which a man might build a magnificent brownstone-front house, seems to me is high; and I reserve the point of order.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, we have two public-convenience stations on Pennsylvania avenue. I believe everybody is familiar now with the large patronage they have, and the real convenience they have given to the public, who are satisfied they are a good thing.

Mr. PERKINS. Is this to be underground?

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. It is proposed to be put underground near the Carnegie Library, making it as little objectionable as possible.

Mr. PERKINS. Does not the gentleman think that that is quite expensive?

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. The other cost more than this is going to cost.

Mr. PERKINS. The other did cost more than this is to? The figure of $20,000 strikes me as very large.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Well, have you been in these stations?

Mr. PERKINS. No.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. I wish you would go and examine them. I do not say that in any spirit of levity. I think it is a matter of education for any man to inspect either of the public-convenience stations on Pennsylvania avenue. Now, the gentleman asks where this is proposed to be located. On a plat of ground covered in part by the Carnegie Library, but near Seventh street, one of the most congested portions of the city.

Mr. MANN. It will be practically on Seventh street?

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Just a bit off Seventh street.

Mr. MANN. Used by the traffic on Seventh street?

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Right near that congested corner.

Mr. PERKINS. I withdraw the point of order on the statement made by the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is withdrawn.

The Clerk read as follows:

And the jurisdiction and control of such portion of said public reservation No. 8 as may be required for the location and operation of said station and approaches thereto is hereby transferred from the Chief of Engineers of the United States Army to the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, such transfer to take effect from the date of notice by said Commissioners to the Chief of Engineers of the United States Army of the portion of said reservation selected, and said Commissioners are further authorized to make all necessary rules and regulations for the management of said station and fix the charges to be made for the use thereof.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order upon that paragraph.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, the necessity for that is this: The ground upon which the proposed public-comfort station is to be located is now under the control of the War Department. It is believed that it will be better to transfer that control to the municipal authorities; and for that reason this provision is made.

Mr. MANN. How much ground is there in this reservation No. 8? How much in the tract?

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. The whole of that square.

Mr. MANN. Well, it is a public square, in the sense of being a park?

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Yes; of which the Carnegie Library building occupies the central portion. It is simply to give better control; that is all.

Mr. MANN. The fear I have is that it will complicate the question as to who has jurisdiction.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. No; the limits are fixed there.

Mr. MANN. "The location and the operation of the stations and approaches thereto." I withdraw the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is withdrawn. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For general supplies, repairs, new batteries, and battery supplies, telephone rental and purchase, wire for extension of the telegraph and telephone service, repairs of lines and instruments, purchase of poles, tools, insulators, brackets, pins, hardware, cross arms, ice, record books, stationery, printing, livery, horses and harness, washing, blacksmithing, forage, extra labor, new boxes, rent of storeroom, and other necessary items, $12,000.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking a question for information. Can the gentleman in charge of the bill inform me what amount is paid for telephones used by the Government, what the monthly or annual rental is?

The reason I make this inquiry is that three or four years ago the House put an amendment on this appropriation bill, in which it fixed the price at which the telephone service should be conducted, so far as the amount paid by the Government to the telephone company was concerned. That went to the Senate, and in conference it went out of the bill, after a consultation with the officers of the telephone company, in which they said that both the charges would be made reasonable and that the service would be made more efficient and satisfactory. At that time the service was very poor. I do not know that it has improved a great deal, but the officers of the company said at that time that when they had perfected certain improvements the service would be improved and the prices would be made less objectionable. I know the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] and myself supported the amendment offered to the bill in the House making appropriations for the District of Columbia; but, as I say, it was stricken out after it went to conference. I make the inquiry in order to ascertain if information can be given by the gentleman in charge of the bill what amount the Government pays and what amount is paid by the people of the District for telephone service, so we can find out if the grounds for complaint then existing have been removed.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I presume the same rule applies to all Departments of the Government. I think the arrangement in other branches of the Government is the same as it is at the Capitol. The telephone service in the Capitol building, for instance, is fixed upon this basis: There is a charge of $6 a year for each telephone put in operation. We maintain the exchange. For an outgoing call that goes outside of the Capitol exchange a charge is made. I am not sure whether it is 5 cents a message or less than that.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Two cents and a half.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from Michigan states that it is two cents and a half. No charge is made for a message from one telephone in the exchange to another telephone in the exchange. Now, the Treasury Department exchange reaches to the different branches of the service connected with that Department; the other Departments of the Government are similarly equipped, and I think the District fire and police departments are upon the same basis, which is certainly not above the cost of operation.

Mr. GOULDEN. Who bears the expense of the installation?

Mr. MANN. The company bears the expense of putting up the telephones.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. Can the gentleman inform the committee how much private citizens pay for the telephones in their residences?

Mr. MANN. That is a varying rate. I can only tell from my own telephone service. I am not posted as to others, and would not have known anything about this if it had not been for the fact that the equipment of the House Office Building led me to examine into the matter. I know since my telephone has been maintained in my house the rate has been reduced considerably. I think it is about $4 a month, based, however, upon the actual number of messages which are sent. I get a rebate every year because we are not here during the summer time.

Mr. WILSON of Illinois. It is 5 cents a call, is it not, where they telephone from one of the public buildings to another?

Mr. MANN. I think it is 2½ cents a call.

Mr. WILSON of Illinois. I thought it was 5 cents.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Two and a half cents, under this contract.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. Anyone who calls in a hotel pays 10 cents.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. In some hotels 10 and in others 5.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. I never struck one where I did not pay 10 cents.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. That matter belongs to the Committee on the District of Columbia rather than to the Committee on Appropriations, because the Committee on Appropriations has no authority to fix the rate.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. I understand that; but the relief that I sought was offered in the form of an amendment upon the appropriation bill by limiting the expenditure. After the explanation has been made I shall not offer any amendment. I am glad to know that some relief and some improvement in the service has been obtained, pursuant to the legislation which was offered by myself some years ago.

The Clerk read as follows:

For electric arc lighting, and for extensions of such service, not exceeding $115,000: Provided, That not more than $85 per annum shall be paid for any electric arc light burning from fifteen minutes after sunset to forty-five minutes before sunrise, and operated wholly by means of underground wire; and each arc light shall be of not less than 1,000 actual candlepower, and no part of this appropriation shall be used for electric lighting by means of wires that may exist on or over any of the streets or avenues of the city of Washington.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Chairman, I wish to offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 38, line 8, after the word "exceeding," strike out the word "one" and insert the word "two."

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Chairman, that is so the section will read "for electric arc-light extension not exceeding $215,000." I have made a little effort at an analysis of this lighting provision for the city. In my opinion a large part of the robberies that have been committed in the city of Washington grow out of the fact that the city is poorly lighted. It is lighted now by little gas sparks, and it is almost impossible to tell the color of a man you meet when you meet him under a gaslight. I find from this bill that a 60-candlepower gaslight costs $20 per year, while a 1,000-candlepower arc light costs $85 per year. At the rate of the gaslight a thousand-candlepower gaslight would cost $300 per year instead of $85 per year.

I am not well posted on these matters of light cost, but I believe the streets in the residence portion of Washington are absolutely so much in the dark that that is the reason they are the regions of so much robbery in the city of Washington. Of course all robberies do not occur in dark spots, but the habit being started, a citizen is knocked down and the criminal escaping with immunity causes others to take more risk. An arc light will illumine the street, if placed in the center of it, hundreds of feet on either side, and in my opinion no money can be better spent than for the protection of the women of this Capital City by providing these arc lights. This amendment is to make provision for the extension of the arc lights in the city.

As the arc lights are extended, Mr. Chairman, the gas lights will be done away with, and I believe that the streets of the city should be illumined by electric lights rather than by gas lights. I think this is a practical matter. I do not know that the committee took it into consideration. It has occurred to me by reason of the fact that I have seen so much from day to day of robberies in the city of Washington, and it is said that more are committed in this city than in any other city of its size in the United States.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. That is not true, as the statistics will show. On that point Washington compares very favorably with any city of its class in the country. In homicides it is very much better than some of the other cities that could be named.

Mr. HARDY. Granting that the gentleman is correct on this matter, upon which I have nothing but newspaper statements, is it not a fact that the arc light would be cheaper and a better light, according to the cost by the bill's own figures, than the gas light? A 1,000-candlepower arc light costs $85 a year, and the same candlepower in gas would cost $300 per year. My purpose is to cheapen the illumination as well as to better it.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I hope the amendment will not be adopted. The Commissioners asked for $124,350. The committee gave them $115,000—within $9,000 of the estimate. Now, it is proposed, while we are under contract in this lighting system, to add almost 100 per cent even to the estimate and change and revolutionize the system here under a five-minute debate. Granting every argument the gentleman from Texas has advanced, I think it would be unwise. I hope the amendment will be voted down.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Chairman, in confirmation of what the gentleman from Michigan has stated, I want to say that Washington is an exceedingly bad city for arc lights. It is a forest of trees, and whereas in some cities the arc light is better for the street because it throws its light so far, yet in Washington during six months of the year the streets are so full of foliage that the arc light is almost useless. You must have lights nearer together—either gas or incandescent. In the business street arc lights can be and are used, but in the residence streets, with their thick rows of trees, the light from the arc illumines the sky, but leaves the street mostly in shadow.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. DALZELL, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 20063, the District of Columbia appropriation bill, and had come to no resolution thereon.

LEAVES OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. MCKINNEY, for an indefinite time, on account of serious illness of mother.

To Mr. CLARK of Florida, for an indefinite period, on account of important business.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

By unanimous consent, leave was granted to Mr. FOSTER of Illinois to withdraw from the files of the House, without leaving copies, the papers in the case of Theodore R. Stearns, H. R. 7520, Fifty-ninth Congress, no adverse report having been made thereon.

CIVIL GOVERNMENT IN CANAL ZONE.

The Speaker laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States, which was referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce and ordered to be printed:

To the House of Representatives:

A copy of the following resolution has been sent to me:

"Resolved, That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, requested to inform this House, if not incompatible with the public interests, by what authority of law he has exercised the functions of government in the Panama Canal Zone since the date of the expiration of the Fifty-eighth Congress, or by what right or authority the executive, legislative, and judicial functions in the Zone have been performed since that date.

"Attest:

"A. MCDOWELL, Clerk."

In compliance with this request, I have to state as follows:

Civil government has been maintained in the Canal Zone under my direction pursuant to the authority conferred by the treaty between the United States and Panama concluded November 18, 1903, and the acts of Congress approved June 28, 1902; April 28, 1904; March 3, 1905; December 21, 1905; June 30, 1906; March 4, 1907, by which the right to maintain civil government in the Canal Zone was granted to the United States, the duty to maintain it was imposed upon the President, and the means for its maintenance were from year to year expressly and specifically appropriated by Congress.

THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, April 4, 1908.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The question was taken, and on a division demanded by Mr. WILLIAMS there were—ayes 75, noes 46.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan and Mr. WILLIAMS were appointed tellers.

The House again divided, and the tellers reported—ayes 69, noes 57.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

CHARGE OF PEONAGE.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, in Sunday's issue of the Washington Post I find the following article. I will read a part of it:

There is to be no cessation of the Administration's campaign against peonage in the South, in spite of the investigation ordered by Congress. Under instructions of the President, Charles W. Russell, Assistant Attorney-General, who has charge of the work, is to proceed with prosecutions, irrespective of the wealth of the men and the corporations responsible for this condition of slavery or of the fact that the legislative branch of the Government is making an inquiry into the justice of what has been done.

The Administration is forced to continue this important social campaign because of the conditions which have come to light. In a confidential report to the Attorney-General Mr. Russell gave the following striking description of the situation:

"We have henceforth a fight in the open with those who have combined to thwart our purposes through ownership of the principal Florida newspaper, which has suppressed and misrepresented the truth, and sought by the most extraordinary methods to influence juries and public opinion and to drive us out of the State.

I will not read what the article says about Florida, Tennessee, and Georgia, but I refer to this paragraph in reference to North Carolina:

Mr. Russell found peonage in Charlotte, N. C., and aided in obtaining the punishment of persons in charge of the railroad camps at that point. Upon his return from Charlotte to Jacksonville, he presented cases before the grand jury.

"I was compelled to try a case with such a jury as a stranger may expect to get in a community largely dominated by the persons whose affiliations naturally incline them in favor of either the particular defendants or those who were expected to be attacked later on. The foreman, as it turned out, was one Rogers, who is president of the United Groceries Company, which supplies the commissary stores to the turpentine camps. The commissaries, by swindling prices, keep laborers in debt, and consequently in peonage."

Mr. President, I undertake to say that in the paragraph I have read there is not one word of truth, except that there is such a city in the State of North Carolina as Charlotte—one of the best, most progressive cities in the South, situated in the great manufacturing section of our State. It is not located in any turpentine section. I wish to say also that the turpentine camp, if there is a turpentine camp in that State, is more than 100 miles away.

I want to say, furthermore, that there is no peonage in the State of North Carolina. I have inquired from the judges and from the district attorneys, and I have the report of the Attorney-General himself to show it. In this report of the number of complaints of peonage in the South there are but four cases reported from the State of North Carolina, and here now in some confidential report the Assistant Attorney-General announces to the country that there is peonage in North Carolina.

The facts are, sir, that there were some indictments in the eastern district for peonage. There was a railroad being built in eastern North Carolina which was let to contract to citizens of other States, and the persons hired were not citizens of the State and the persons who were claimed to hold American citizens in peonage were not citizens of North Carolina. When the trial was held there was one man tried, and the Assistant Attorney-General went down himself to assist the district attorney in the trial of the case, and the trial resulted in the acquittal of the defendant. So weak and frivolous were the evidence and charges preferred that the judge upon the bench dismissed every other case where there was an indictment, as I am informed.

There were some indictments and a trial in western North Carolina, in the western district, where a railroad was being constructed from West Virginia through the mountains of North Carolina by a railroad contractor from another State, and there were some charges of peonage there. But I am informed, sir, that there was a verdict of not guilty in that case, and there has been no conviction for peonage anywhere in the State.

Also I wish to say that if the laws we have on the subject of peonage could be in anywise construed to be peonage laws they have been declared unconstitutional by the supreme court of North Carolina.

Now, I want to read what the Attorney-General himself says, contradicting his own statement about peonage laws in the State. And he recites this construction of Judge Clark, the chief justice of our supreme court, upon certain sections in our laws which provide that where a laborer enters into a contract with his landlord and contracts to serve him for a year, and obtains certain advances from him, and the laborer after having obtained the advances fails to perform his part of the contract, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor. I take the following from the report of the Attorney-General in regard to this opinion:

The judges of our superior court, in charging the grand jury, have taken notice of where such indictments lead to, and have advised against prosecutions. In addition to that, the supreme court of this State has recently delivered an opinion in State v. Robinson, to be reported in the 143 North Carolina, wherein Chief Justice Clark, in a concurring opinion, goes out of his way to practically say that sections 3365, 3366, and 3367 are unconstitutional; and I herewith inclose you that part of his decision referring to this matter.

Showing, Mr. President, that there is no peonage there, and that this is a slander upon North Carolina. I doubt if the Attorney-General can show a single case where a citizen of the State has ever been indicted and convicted for peonage, and for one I am tired of voting for these appropriations to send out long-haired men and short-haired women to spy upon our people and to make these slanderous reports, a stop should be put to it.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. WARREN. I am directed by the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 17288) making appropriation for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1909, to report it with amendments, and I submit a report (No. 464) thereon. I give notice that I shall call up the bill at the earliest possible opportunity for consideration.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. WARREN, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to whom was referred the bill (S. 4172) providing for the erection of an addition to the court-house of the District of Columbia for the use of the court of appeals, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report (No. 465) thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom were referred the following bills, asked to be discharged from their further consideration, and that they be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, which was agreed to:

A bill (S. 6440) to regulate commerce among the several States or with foreign nations, and to amend the act approved July 2, 1890, entitled "An act to protect trade and commerce against unlawful restraints and monopolies;" and

A bill (S. 6331) to legalize contracts and agreements not in unreasonable restraint of trade or commerce.

Mr. NELSON, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the amendment submitted by himself on the 31st ultimo, providing that hereafter the judges of the district courts of the United States shall be allowed $6 per day as expenses for travel, etc., intended to be proposed to the sundry civil appropriation bill, reported favorably thereon, and moved that it be referred to the Committee on Appropriations and printed, which was agreed to.

Mr. DIXON. I am directed by the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 6159) to establish a permanent national bison range, to report it with amendments, and I submit a report (No. 467) thereon.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. DIXON. I should like to ask that a thousand extra copies of the report be printed for the use of the Senate. With the report are certain statistics gathered by the American Bison Society, showing the present number and condition of the buffalo in different parts of the country. I have attached those statistics to the report, and, owing to the numerous demands already made for copies of the report, I ask that a thousand extra copies be printed for the use of the Senate. The statistics and information, I think, are well worthy of public preservation.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Montana asks unanimous consent that a thousand additional copies of the report be printed for the use of the Senate. Without objection it is so ordered.

Mr. GAMBLE, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2405) for the restoration of annuities to the Medawakanton and Wahpakoota (Santee) Sioux Indians, declared forfeited by the act of February 16, 1863, reported it with an amendment and submitted a report (No. 468) thereon.

He also, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (S. 5505) to define and suppress vagrancy within the District of Columbia, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 469) thereon.

Mr. HALE, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom were referred the following bills, reported them severally without amendment, and submitted reports thereon:

I give notice that immediately after the disposition of the Army appropriation bill, reported by the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] from the Committee on Military Affairs, I shall ask the Senate to take up and consider this bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. LONG, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (S. 5429) to facilitate the use for manufacturing purposes of square No. 328, in the city of Washington, as authorized in the act of Congress of February 1, 1907, reported it with an amendment and submitted a report (No. 474) thereon.

Mr. SCOTT. I am directed by the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (S. 6105) for the relief of pensioners of the Metropolitan police fund, to report it with amendments. I shall call the bill up at a very early day.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be placed on the Calendar.

THEODORE F. NORTHROP.

Mr. FORAKER. I am directed by the Committee on Military Affairs to report back favorably without amendment the bill (S. 2253) for the relief of Theodore F. Northrop, and I submit a report (No. 475) thereon. I ask for the present consideration of the bill.

The Secretary read the bill, and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It provides that Theodore F. Northrop, late first lieutenant, Second Regiment New York Cavalry Volunteers, shall be held and considered to have been a captain of cavalry, in command of scouts in the army of General Sherman, from September 10, 1864, to May 22, 1865; and the Secretary of War is authorized to issue to Northrop a certificate of such service and of honorable discharge in accordance with this act. But no pay, bounty, or other allowance shall become due and payable by reason of this act.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CEMETERY LAND IN DUBUQUE, IOWA.

Mr. NELSON. From the Committee on Public Lands, I report back favorably without amendment the bill (S. 6363) granting title to a parcel of land in the city of Dubuque, Iowa, heretofore known as St. Raphael's Cemetery, to the archbishop of Dubuque and to his successors in office, and confirming and establishing title thereto accordingly, and I submit a report (No. 476) thereon. I call the attention of the senior Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] to the bill.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask unanimous consent that the bill may be now considered. It will take but a moment. It is a technical way of granting a certain tract of land to the Roman Catholic Church, which has been in possession of the land since 1836. It has been used exclusively for a cemetery and will be so used in the future, but there is a technicality required to be removed in order that the title may be in the archbishop of the diocese.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be read for the information of the Senate.

The Secretary read the bill, and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The preamble was agreed to.

MISSION LAND IN MINNESOTA.

Mr. CLAPP. From the Committee on Indian Affairs, I am authorized to report back favorably without amendment, except to strike out the preamble, the bill (S. 6462) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to issue patents in fee to the diocese of Duluth of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States of America for certain lands in Minnesota set apart for the use of said church for missionary purposes among the Chippewa Indians. It is a local bill, and I ask that it be now considered.

The Secretary read the bill, and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. CLAPP. I move to strike out the preamble.

The motion was agreed to.

STATUE OF JABEZ LAMAR MONROE CURRY.

And the said court shall proceed with the same in accordance with the provisions of such act, and report to the Senate in accordance therewith.

COMPANIES B, C, AND D, TWENTY-FIFTH INFANTRY.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President, I submit the resolution which I send to the desk, and ask for its present consideration.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Ohio presents a resolution and asks for its present consideration. The resolution will be read for the information of the Senate.

The Secretary read as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, directed to furnish to the Senate the names, if any, of the enlisted men of Companies of B, C, and D, Twenty-fifth United States Infantry, discharged without honor from the Army on account of the Brownsville, Tex., shooting affray on the night of August 13, 1906, who applied for reenlistment in the service of the United States under the order of the Secretary of War, dated December 12, 1906, and referred to by the President in his message to the Senate of March 11, 1908; and that he report to the Senate also what testimony or statements may have been submitted by said applicants, respectively, and what action, if any, was taken upon said applications, or any of them.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. CULBERSON. I do not care to object to the present consideration of the resolution; that is, I do not care to object to its consideration to-day, but I should like to examine it.

Mr. FORAKER. I think the Senator, on a word of explanation from me, will not have any objection to the resolution. The Senator will remember that in the President's message sent here recently in regard to the Brownsville matter, he stated that on the 12th day of December, 1906, by his direction the Secretary of War made an order under which these men could apply for reenlistment; but before they had made much progress under it an investigation was ordered, and thereupon applications for reenlistment under that order were suspended. This is simply asking that the Secretary of War will send to us whatever applications were made, so that we may know what soldiers, if any, did apply and what statements they submitted in support of their application. I showed the resolution to the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs [Mr. WARREN], and he saw no objection to it. So I simply call for information that I think the Senate would be glad to have.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. FORAKER. Certainly.

Mr. CULBERSON. As I indicated a while ago, I have no objection to the present consideration of the resolution submitted by the Senator from Ohio. I simply wanted some explanation of it or an opportunity to read it. In view of the explanation by the Senator, I have no objection to the present consideration of the resolution.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I just came into the Chamber; and as I understand, this resolution is to get a list of the discharged soldiers who applied for readmission to the Army?

Mr. FORAKER. Under the order of December 12, 1906. That order was made by the Secretary of War by direction of the President, as we are advised in the President's message.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

ACTION OF NEW YORK CITY BANKS.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, I submit the resolution which I send to the desk, for which I ask present consideration.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Texas submits a resolution which will be read for the information of the Senate.

The Secretary read as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be, and is hereby, directed to transmit to the Secretary of the Treasury a copy of the resolution of the Senate adopted February 18, 1908, as follows:

"Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to inform the Senate if any national banks outside the city of New York complained by telegrams or letters to the Treasury Department, the Secretary of the Treasury, the Treasurer of the United States, or the Comptroller of the Currency between October 1, 1907, and November 15, 1907, of the refusal of national banks of New York City to pay in cash New York exchange or to respond to calls for reserves; and if so, the Secretary is directed to send to the Senate copies of all such telegrams and letters and answers thereto."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. There appear to be some words added to the original resolution as it passed the Senate.

Mr. CULBERSON. They were added, Mr. President, by the superintendent of the document room. It is an amendment adopted in the Senate on the motion of the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP].

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. HOPKINS. In the absence of the chairman of the Finance Committee, I think the resolution had better go over under the rule.

Mr. CULBERSON. If the Senator will pardon me a moment——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. HOPKINS. I do.

Mr. CULBERSON. This is a resolution adopted by the Senate on the 18th of February. For some reason it has not been answered by the Secretary of the Treasury, and the only purpose of this resolution is to have the Secretary of the Senate transmit to the Secretary of the Treasury a copy of the original resolution, so that it may be determined whether or not the omission to answer is intentional. I presume that the Secretary has overlooked this matter in some way, and my only purpose is to remind him of the existence of the resolution by the transmission of another copy of it to him.

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. President, I think it will be better to let the resolution go over under the rule, and a personal call upon the Secretary will determine the matter as well as the official action of the Senate. I would prefer, in the absence of the chairman of the Finance Committee, that the resolution go over under the rule.

Mr. CULBERSON. Of course I can not help that objection being made.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will go over under the rule.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

H. R. 19158. An act making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1909, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

DONATION OF NEW FLAG TO OKLAHOMA.

The joint resolution (H. J. Res. 148) donating to the Commonwealth of Oklahoma the new flag now floating over the National Capitol was read the first time by its title.

Mr. GORE. I ask for the present consideration of the joint resolution.

There being on objection, the joint resolution was read the second time at length and considered as in Committee of the Whole, as follows:

Whereas the first flag bearing forty-six stars, emblematical of forty-six sovereign States, to-day floats over the National Capitol; and

Whereas the State of Oklahoma is for the first time the proud recipient of equal recognition with the sister States of the Union; and

Whereas the flag has a peculiar value to the State of Oklahoma and her million and a half of citizens residing within her borders; and

Whereas the intrinsic value of the new flag is of minor consequence to the Government of the United States and to the sister States: Therefore

Resolved, etc., That the new flag bearing forty-six stars, now floating over the National Capitol, be, and the same is hereby, donated to the Commonwealth of Oklahoma, to be kept and remain in the archives of the Oklahoma Historical Society of Oklahoma.

Mr. GORE. I desire to offer an amendment to the joint resolution. In line 3 I move to substitute for the words "now floating" the words "first floated."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BURKETT. I should like to ask a question for information. If I remember the law aright, the forty-sixth star can not go on the flag until the Fourth of July. I ask for information, by what authority the flag now comes to have forty-six stars on it?

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, the Senator from Nebraska states that the forty-sixth star can not be officially placed on the flag until the Fourth of July. However that may be, it has been placed on the flag, and the flag has been floated over the Capitol, whether rightly or wrongly, and Oklahoma wants the flag.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

Mr. KEAN. I should like to ask the Senator from Oklahoma a question. Does the flag belong the Government of the United States? I have heard that it is the property of a private citizen.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I presume that the United States would not have floated above the Capitol a flag belonging to a private individual. But we would like to have a warranty deed from the Government of the United States to that flag.

Mr. KEAN. If the United States has no title to it, how can it give a warranty deed?

Mr. GORE. We are perfectly willing to accept it, and we will relegate to the future all other controversies with reference to the flag. If the Senator knows where the title is vested, I would be glad to be enlightened by him.

Mr. KEAN. I should like to ask the Senator another question: Is the flag at present flying over the Capitol?

Mr. GORE. No, sir; it is not.

Mr. KEAN. The joint resolution so states.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. That has been changed by an amendment.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed, and the joint resolution to be read a third time.

The joint resolution was read the third time and passed.

The preamble was amended by striking out the words "to-day floats" and inserting in lieu thereof the words "and that first floated."

The title was amended so as to read: "A joint resolution donating to the Commonwealth of Oklahoma the new flag that first floated over the National Capitol."

SNAKE RIVER DAM, WASHINGTON.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives, disagreeing to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 7618) to authorize the Benton Water Company, its successors or assigns, to construct a dam across the Snake River, in the State of Washington, and requesting a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. PILES. I move that the Senate insist on its amendments, agree to the conference asked by the House of Representatives, and that the conferees on the part of the Senate be appointed by the Chair.

The motion was agreed to; and the Vice-President appointed Mr. NELSON, Mr. PILES, and Mr. MARTIN as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. W. J. BROWNING, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 4260) to amend an act entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to regulate commerce,' approved February 4, 1887, and all acts amendatory thereof, and to enlarge the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission," approved June 29, 1906.

The massage also announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 20310) relative to the liability of common carriers by railroads to their employees in certain cases, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

FREEDMAN'S SAVINGS AND TRUST COMPANY.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The morning business is closed.

Mr. KEAN. Regular order, Mr. President.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Jersey demands the regular order, which is the Calendar, under Rule VIII.

The bill (S. 48) to reimburse depositors of the late Freedman's Savings and Trust Company was announced as first in order.

Mr. GALLINGER. I call the attention of the junior Senator from Georgia [Mr. CLAY] to the fact that the bill to reimburse depositors of the Freedman's Savings and Trust Company has just been reached on the Calendar. I trust the Senator is satisfied to let the bill go through.

Mr. CLAY. I am willing that the bill should be taken up and acted upon. By that I do not mean that I am going to vote for it, but I am willing to have it acted on.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill.

Mr. GALLINGER. The bill has been read once or twice.

Mr. FLINT. Have the amendments to the amendment of the committee offered by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. McLAURIN] been agreed to?

Mr. GALLINGER. The amendments were agreed to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Certain amendments to the amendment of the committee have been offered and agreed to, and there is no pending amendment.

Mr. McLAURIN. The amendments that I offered were agreed to, were they not?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair so understands.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EMPLOYMENT OF CHILD LABOR.

The bill (S. 4812) to regulate the employment of child labor in the District of Columbia was announced as next in order.

Mr. GALLINGER. Let that go over, Mr. President.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will go over without prejudice, at the request of the Senator from New Hampshire.

ENLARGEMENT OF HOMESTEADS.

The bill (S. 6155) to provide for an enlarged homestead was announced as next in order, and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed its consideration, the pending question being on the amendment reported from the Committee on Public Lands, in section 1, page 1, line 6, after the word "California," to strike out "Idaho," so as to make the section read:

That any person who is a qualified entryman under the homestead laws of the United States may enter, by legal subdivisions, under the provisions of this act, in the States of Colorado, California, Montana, Nevada, North Dakota, Oregon, Utah, Washington, and Wyoming, and the Territories of Arizona and New Mexico, 320 acres, or less, of nonmineral, nonirrigable, unreserved, and unappropriated surveyed public lands which do not contain merchantable timber, located in a reasonably compact body, and not over 1½ miles in extreme length.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was one heretofore submitted by Mr. CARTER, in section 1, page 2, line 2, after the word "length," to insert the following proviso:

Provided, That no land shall be subject to entry under this act until the Secretary of the Interior shall have ascertained and certified that no water is available or obtainable at reasonable expense for the reclamation thereof by artificial irrigation.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask that that amendment be disagreed to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was rejected.

The next amendment was one heretofore submitted by Mr. TELLER, in section 3, page 2, line 19, after the word "lying," to strike out "contiguous to" and to insert "within five miles," so as to make the section read:

SEC. 3. That any homestead entryman now occupying lands of the character hereinafter described, heretofore entered by him, upon which final proof has not been made, shall have the right to enter public lands, subject to the provisions of this act, lying within 5 miles of his former entry which shall not, together with the original entry, exceed 320 acres, and residence upon and cultivation of the original entry shall be deemed as residence upon and cultivation of the additional entry.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SMOOT. There is one other amendment, in section 1, page 1, line 9, of the bill, that I should like to have added, which was suggested by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH].

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In section 1, page 1, line 9, before the word "nonmineral," it is proposed to insert the word "arid."

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, in committee I offered an amendment that after the word "nonirrigable," in line 9, page 1," the words "arid" and "semiarid" be inserted. That is, I presume, the amendment to which the Senator from Utah refers.

Mr. SMOOT. I refer to the amendment of the junior Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], which proposes to insert only the word "arid," and not "semiarid." The word "arid" is to be put in the bill on line 9 after the word "of."

Mr. HEYBURN. That is, the Senator from Utah accepts a part of the amendment.

Mr. SMOOT. I accept a part of the amendment. The word "arid" I am perfectly willing to accept.

Mr. HEYBURN. But not "semiarid."

Mr. SMOOT. I am perfectly willing to accept "semiarid," but I understood the junior Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] did not wish the word "semiarid" inserted.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, the amendments I offered were in committee, and I feel at liberty to say that I have not offered any amendment in the Senate because of the amendment in line 6, on page 1, in which "Idaho" was stricken from the bill. As the bill applies to a number of other States, I have taken it for granted that Senators representing the other States would look after the interests of their States, and I did not feel inclined to interfere. My colleague [Mr. BORAH] has conferred with me and with the committee in regard to this matter. I think we are agreed as to the provisions we would require incorporated in the bill before allowing Idaho to be included in it.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to his colleague?

Mr. HEYBURN. I do.

Mr. BORAH. Do I understand that we are discussing now the committee amendments to the bill or the amendments which were offered?

Mr. SMOOT. We are discussing the amendment which was offered by the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. The amendment which I offered in the Senate was to insert "arid" only. I understand my colleague [Mr. HEYBURN] offered an amendment in committee to insert "arid and semiarid." I am perfectly willing that the amendment "arid and semiarid" shall prevail; that is to say, I have no objection to it.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, that country is designated as "semiarid" in all the Government reports. It is not "arid" anywhere within the strict meaning of that term, and the amendment should read "semiarid."

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEYBURN] yield further to his colleague?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. BORAH. I am aware that the Government reports refer to a portion of the State of Idaho as "semiarid." I am also aware of the fact that the supreme court of our State a number of times has referred to the land which is particularly sought to be covered by this kind of an act as "arid land." For that reason, I thought it well to put in "arid and semiarid," and am perfectly willing that it shall be so amended.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. SMOOT. Do I understand, then, that the Senator from Idaho offers an amendment to insert the words "arid and semiarid?"

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Mr. SMOOT. I am perfectly willing to accept that amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Idaho will be stated.

The SECRETARY. Before the word "nonmineral," in section 1, line 9, it is proposed to insert the words "arid and semiarid," so that if amended the section will read:

That any person who is a qualified entryman under the homestead laws of the United States may enter, by legal subdivisions, under the provisions of this act, in the States of Colorado, California, Montana, Nevada, North Dakota, Oregon, Utah, Washington, and Wyoming, and the Territories of Arizona and New Mexico, 320 acres, or less, of arid and semiarid nonmineral, nonirrigable, unreserved, and unappropriated surveyed public lands which do not contain merchantable timber, located in a reasonably compact body, and not over 1½ miles in extreme length.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. McCUMBER. I want some explanation about the amendment. The Senator from Idaho is on his feet. I do not know whether or not he is going to speak to the amendment.

Mr. HEYBURN. It is my intention to explain my purpose as soon as the amendment has been formally acted upon.

Mr. McCUMBER. I want the amendment explained before it is voted upon; and, if the Senator is willing, I should like to ask him a question or two now.

Mr. HEYBURN. I shall be glad to hear the Senator.

Mr. McCUMBER. I notice that the bill as now amended will apply as well to semiarid as to arid lands. That necessarily brings up two important questions: The first is, What is the proper line of demarcation between "arid" and "semiarid" land, and between "semiarid" land and other characters of land in the United States. I do not know whether the Department has ruled that there must be a rainfall of so many inches a year to make it semiarid, and none to make it arid. If so, what is their ruling? I ask also whether or not there is a difference as to whether the fall of moisture is in winter or in the summer time? Then—and I am asking these questions so that the Senator can take them all up at one time—the next question is, Suppose there are many homestead entries already made in what you call the "semiarid" country? Now, you provide that all future entries in the same section of the country shall contain 320 acres. Is there provision made, then, that those who have taken only 160 acres may have another 160 acres in the same section of country? I shall be much obliged to the Senator from Idaho if he will explain each of these propositions.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, if I may have the attention of the Senate for a moment, this bill is of much more importance than might be inferred from the amount of attention which it is receiving upon its consideration. I have asked in committee that Idaho be excepted from the provisions of the bill because, before allowing the bill to be applied to the State of Idaho, I should want it amended in some very material particulars which I suggested in the committee.

We passed through the Senate recently what was known as the "dry-farming bill." There is a real necessity existing for such legislation; but it does not follow, because such a necessity exists, that any bill which may come before us will meet the requirements of that necessity. There never was a more important bill before this Senate than the one that is now under consideration. It is just such a bill as was before the Congress of the United States at the time that that distinguished Senator from Massachusetts, Mr. Webster, entered into his famous debate with the distinguished Senator from South Carolina, Mr. Hayne. That question was no more important than the question involved in this bill. That was proposed legislation affecting the disposal of the public lands. While the border of civilization had been advanced not beyond the Mississippi River, the question presented was the same as that which is now presented upon the border of civilization, if I may use that term, which is hardly applicable, but it may be taken in the sense in which I mean it, at the Rocky Mountains.

Mr. President, there is no technical distinction between the term "semiarid" and "arid" lands. Lands that are semiarid this season may be entirely arid next season, and lands that are arid this season may be next season semiarid. The term has no legal significance that distinguishes one class of lands from another. So that in legislating upon it it behooves us to be very careful. There are such vast areas of land to be affected by this apparently unimportant bill—if we may judge of its importance from the amount of consideration that it is receiving from time to time—such vast areas that it seems to me it ought not to have been considered under Rule VIII at all.

I am limited, under that rule, to five minutes in presenting a question which involves an area as large as the whole of the Middle States of the United States, which involves the future disposition and settlement of those lands and the character of titles, and yet, under Rule VIII, we are under five minutes' limitation in explaining it. Inasmuch as Idaho has been stricken from the bill, it might be considered that it would not be important to Idaho what disposition was made of it; but we are here as Senators from every State in the Union, and when you come to discuss the policy of the Government relative to the public lands of the United States every Senator is interested in it. We are met here upon the discussion of the forestry question by the statement that the New England and the Middle and the Southern States have as much interest in and are as much owners of the forests of Idaho as the people who live in Idaho. So it is true we are here as Senators of the United States and not Senators of any particular State, as has been often stated upon this floor; and, inasmuch as I am called upon by other Senators to explain this amendment, I feel that it can not possibly, to the end of wise legislation, be disposed of under Rule VIII. I know the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] is anxious to see this bill enacted into law, and I know the Senate has passed judgment upon the dry-farming bill. We have passed it and sent it to the other branch of Congress for its consideration, where it is now being considered. We can not undertake to enter into the details here as to the amount of consideration it is receiving or will receive there; but I do know that we do not want upon the statute books two dry-farming bills.

If this bill can be amended so as to meet the requirements of dry-farming legislation and at the same time a resolution may be adopted by the Senate withdrawing the bill we have sent to the other House, then I will cheerfully submit to having Idaho restored to the provisions of this bill and take up this great question for that serious, deliberate, and intelligent consideration that it deserves; but I can not consent that Idaho shall be included within the provisions of a bill ostensibly for the purpose of making provision for dry farming when we have already passed such a bill that presumably will be passed by the other House.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I wish to say to the Senator from Idaho that it is true a dry-farm bill passed the Senate, but its provisions only applied to dry farm lands, and not to semiarid lands or lands that could be cultivated, even by the storage of water. It was so strict in its provisions that there could be no water upon the land to which it applied; no potable water; no water for domestic purposes. Its provisions were such that the land affected by it had to be dry farm land pure and simple.

After the bill had passed the Senate and went to the House, the House Committee on Public Lands took it up for consideration, and a great many Representatives of the Western States—the States mentioned in the bill—thought that it was a proper thing to hold a conference on the bill. All of the States wanted their dry farm lands cultivated, but they did not feel that wherever water could be stored sufficient for domestic purposes, and perhaps enough to irrigate 40 or 80 acres of the 320 provided for in the bill, an entryman should not be relieved from residing on the land and therefore Mr. President, this bill is virtually a consolidation of the dry farm provision without residence and semiarid farming with residence.

After two or three conferences, held for hours at a time, it was decided that this was the proper wording of a bill to allow the arid and semiarid lands of the Western States to be entered. I believe, Mr. President, that it does meet the needs of the West, and I know, as the Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEYBURN] stated, that it is a most important measure. If it passes it means that hundreds and thousands of acres of land that to-day are parched, dried up, and unproductive will, in the near future, be fields of grain, cultivated under the dry-farming process, as I explained here the other day. I shall ask that the bill be considered to-day, and I certainly hope the Senate will pass it.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I have been trying to get some information on the bill. I am not a member of the committee which has had it under consideration. I have asked questions of the Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEYBURN], but in the five minutes' discussion he hardly had time to reply to those questions in detail. It is safe to say that the entire western part of the State in which I live might by some be called "semiarid." I do not know that it would be called such, but I am anxious to know what the effect of this bill will be upon the rights of homestead entrymen in my own State.

We conclude that if we can get a fall of 15 inches per annum in certain sections of the State, if it happens to come at the right time, it is amply sufficient to raise a splendid crop. I do not know any section of the State that will not ordinarily have that much rainfall, and yet there are some sections that may suffer during especially dry seasons.

I am not certain as to whether our people would want to allow the Department to denominate all of this land as semiarid, and that those who take homesteads in the future in the same section shall be allowed twice as many acres as the people who have been taking homesteads for the last ten or fifteen years, who have got them under cultivation, and who have been raising pretty fair crops upon them.

So I should like to get hold of some kind of information that will enable me to know what constitutes "arid land" under the decisions of the Department.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly.

Mr. SMOOT. In relation to the question the Senator asks as to the entrymen under this bill having an advantage over the entryman who has taken up lands in the past, I will say that the lands that are left in the public domain are certainly the poorest lands, because the entrymen have always in the past selected the best class of land.

Mr. McCUMBER. I want to say to the Senator right there that there is plenty of Government land still in our State which, the moment it is proved upon, is worth $10 an acre and can be sold for that much, yet that might be called semiarid land. I want to know whether or not a man can take 320 acres of that kind of land.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, "semiarid lands" are lands that are supposed to belong to a class that a profitable agricultural crop can not be cultivated successfully without irrigation.

Mr. McCUMBER. What is the difference, then, between "arid" and "semiarid" land?

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President——

Mr. SMOOT. I will say that the term——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. SMOOT. Very well; I yield.

Mr. HEYBURN. If the Senator will permit me, the term "semiarid" as applied here is just what the word says. It means lands that are arid at times and at some seasons, and at other seasons are not arid. That is the way the terms were first applied to these lands.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say, that I was going to come to the point the Senator makes; but before doing so, I was going to say something about arid lands. "Arid lands" are understood to be dry lands that are impossible of successful cultivation and never has a rainfall sufficient to produce a crop, or, in other words, there is no chance of securing water sufficient by rainfall or by irrigation to mature a profitable crop. I want to say in relation to the term "semiarid" that it is applied as the Senator from Idaho has stated. Some seasons in some, if not all, of the Western States there is a great deal more rainfall than in others. Sometimes we have 10 and sometimes we have 15 inches of rainfall, and sometimes less. But history has demonstrated the fact that land must have 15 inches of waterfall during the year to make successful crops unless especially adapted for dry farming.

Mr. TELLER. And at the right time.

Mr. SMOOT. And, as the Senator from Colorado suggests, at the right time.

Mr. President, in asking that this bill be passed there is no intention whatever to gobble up the public lands. We think the time has arrived when the lands that are left that are not under the irrigation system or do not fall within a watershed that will provide water for an irrigation system should be made subject to the dry-farming system, which is the only one that can reclaim those lands.

Mr. McCUMBER. Let me ask the Senator who is to determine what land is arid and what land is semiarid, and what is the basis of that determination?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the basis is, as I said before, lands that are impossible of being irrigated. This bill only relates to nonirrigable lands.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. SMOOT. I do.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, the word "semiarid" is not entirely a happy term with reference to distinguishing arid and semiarid lands, because the terms "arid" and "semiarid" are used indifferently by the courts to designate that land which will not produce crops without some kind of artificial irrigation.

Mr. McCUMBER. Does the Senator mean, then, that "semiarid" means land that will not produce crops without irrigation?

Mr. BORAH. Without artificial irrigation; and the terms are used, as I say, interchangeably and indifferently by the courts in regard to that subject. The amendment which I suggested was with reference to arid lands alone; but, as has been said by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER], and truly said, the word "semiarid" has been applied to all those lands out through that country which fail to produce crops or will not produce crops without artificial irrigation. I think, if you will examine the bill, provided this amendment is accepted, you will find that it contains the words "arid, semiarid, nonirrigable," which would cover any land possible to be covered by any terms which would not produce crops without artificial irrigation. The courts throughout our country have not defined precisely what "semiarid" or "arid" means; but, as I say, have used the terms indifferently to designate that class of land.

Mr. McCUMBER. I understood, Mr. President, the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] to say that it had been ascertained that with less than 15 inches of rainfall in a season good crops could not be produced; and I inferred, therefore, that he considers the Department will hold that any section of country having less than 15 inches of rainfall—I assume during the summer months—would be called "semiarid" or "arid," and that all such land would fall under the provisions of this bill. I want to know if I am right in that, because I want to say to the Senator right in that connection that half of the western portion of the State of North Dakota has less than 15 inches of rainfall in a year, and yet the best crops that we have raised anywhere in the State have been raised in the last seven or eight years on that land. I do not think any section in that northwestern portion has more than 14 inches of rainfall in a year.

Mr. WARREN. Does the Senator include the fall of snow and moisture during the year?

Mr. McCUMBER. I include the entire snow and rainfall during the year.

Mr. WARREN. The moisture during the whole year?

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I want to say that when this bill was under discussion I went down to the General Land Office and called upon the Commissioner of the Land Office and also the Secretary of the Interior in relation to the bill, and they thought the words "nonmineral, nonirrigable, unreserved, unappropriated, surveyed public lands" were sufficient in themselves without the word "arid" or the word "semiarid;" in fact we used the words "arid" and "semiarid" in the dry-farm bill, and there seems to be a feeling here that the words "arid" and "semiarid" should be in this bill. I for one have no objection to those words, because it does seem to me that the term "arid and semiarid lands" simply means lands that can not be cultivated without artificial irrigation.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. SMOOT. I do.

Mr. TELLER. I think in common usage the terms "semiarid" and "arid" mean the same thing. I objected to putting in the word "arid" and leaving "semiarid" out for fear that it would be held to refer to land of a different character. What I want to do is to provide for land that is not irrigable, and the word "nonirrigable," it seems to me, covers the whole ground.

Mr. WARREN. May I ask a question of the Senator from Colorado?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. TELLER. Certainly.

Mr. WARREN. My observation has been that, in the common application of the term, when you say "arid land" you mean land that is not only nonirrigable and dry, but land that will produce nothing of consequence, or, in other words, an absolute desert, while "semiarid" refers more particularly to land which is nonirrigable in sections, but upon which there will be a little growth of grass which may be used for grazing.

Mr. TELLER. I have no doubt that would be technically correct, but in the common use of the terms we have treated them as the same in my section of the country, and have spoken of land as being "arid" or "semiarid."

Of course I think that where there is 15 inches of waterfall the land can hardly be called "arid." In some parts of Colorado we will not average more than 4 inches in a year. Of course it is absolutely impossible to raise any crops either by dry farming or anything else on such land. Some grass grows on the hills and in the valleys, but the land is not cultivable and never can be. In other sections we have from 12 to 14 inches of rain, but I do not believe we have ever gone above 14 inches anywhere. But it depends upon when the rain comes. You may get 14 inches and have no crop, because the rain may not come at a suitable time. If your crop is put in and rain follows, you will get a crop; or if you can start a crop of winter wheat and then the winter is damp and a good deal of snow falls you can get a crop of wheat in the spring. It depends entirely upon how much rain you can get and when that rain comes. You may get a full supply and have no crop at all. I have seen in Colorado from May to December when there was not moisture enough to wet your shoes if you went through the grass. It was absolutely dry during the whole time. Then I have seen summers when perhaps every week there would be a shower. So you can not tell exactly how to regulate this thing.

I suppose the purpose of this bill is to take those lands that can not be cultivated in the ordinary way in which land is cultivated in the Mississippi Valley and other sections of the country, and let a man have them so that he may cultivate half this year by what we used to call in western New York when I was a boy "summer fallowing." That will catch the water that comes during the summer, and if the farmer seeds his wheat during the fall and there is a fair season with some moisture, he will get a crop.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I can easily understand the two extremes. I can understand that this bill would be very proper for the arid lands, as I understand the word "arid;" I understand that naturally it would not apply where we had sufficient rainfall, but where the line of demarcation between the two is to be fixed I have not any definite information from any member of the Senate as yet.

Mr. DIXON. Will the Senator from North Dakota yield to me for a moment?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield.

Mr. DIXON. The Senator from North Dakota was not present at the various meetings of the Western Senators and Representatives when this bill was finally drafted as a compromise bill for all the others that had heretofore been introduced, I believe. That is so, is it not?

Mr. McCUMBER. I was not present.

Mr. DIXON. The terms "arid" and "semiarid" came up for full discussion at all of those meetings; but, owing to the fact that this bill does not in any way disturb the provision of the old original homestead act as to irrigated lands, and not knowing that there were any sections of any of the States enumerated in this bill that were not "semiarid" on account of the somewhat lax method of defining the term, it was thought better to leave out all reference to arid or semiarid lands. At the suggestion of the junior Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], referring to a peculiar condition existing in the northern panhandle portion of Idaho, where certain lands in that State are not arid or semiarid, this amendment was offered here the other day.

I apprehend that the Commissioner of the General Land Office, in the administration of the affairs of the Office and in the permitting of entries under the terms of this bill, would certainly not permit a homestead entry on lands in western North Dakota, which year after year, as the Senator now states, under 15 inches of rainfall annually produce growing crops. It would be subject to contest by any person who attempted to make an entry on that character of land, and certainly, in the administration of the General Land Office, it would not hold as semiarid land that character of land in North Dakota which the Senator has described.

Mr. McCUMBER. Very well, then, Mr. President, if "semiarid" and "arid" mean practically the same thing, if both of them mean lands upon which a crop can not be raised without irrigation, why not make the bill say that, and make it definite and clear, so that we may understand it?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, what is the motion before the Senate?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], which the Secretary will state.

The SECRETARY. On page 1, line 9, after the word "of," it is proposed to insert "arid and semiarid."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER] desired an explanation of the effect of the proposed amendment before it was voted on.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. LODGE. I beg pardon. I thought we were under the five-minute rule and that each Senator could speak but once.

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield to the Senator.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. If there is objection, the rule will be enforced. Does the Senator from Massachusetts object?

Mr. LODGE. I do not object, only I thought I had a claim to the floor. I merely wish to say that the introduction of the words "arid" and "semiarid" changes the entire character of the bill. It puts in a term upon which no two Senators who have spoken have been agreed, and it seems to me, opens a vast body of land to dispute, as the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER] has pointed out. This bill proposes to give an opportunity to secure a much larger amount of land than is now granted under the homestead law. Under particular circumstances that no doubt is a good thing, as it seems to me, for lands which are not irrigable and which can not be cultivated without irrigation, which is, as I understand, the kind of land proposed to be affected. To insert the word "semiarid" might open half the public lands in the United States; you would have disputed titles; and it would change the whole character of the bill. The bill is proceeding by unanimous consent, I think, Mr. President, and if it is desired to proceed with it, it would be well to modify that amendment.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, it seems to me very important, in the light of the observations made by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], to reach some understanding as to what the term "nonirrigable" means. "Irrigable land" is; in the common acceptance of the term, land which requires artificial irrigation to produce a crop.

Mr. LODGE. So I understand.

Mr. CARTER. Nonirrigable land is land which may be irrigated, but does not require artificial irrigation to raise a crop. It is manifestly the purpose of this bill to refer to the former and not to the latter. If the bill without the amendment proposed by the Senator from Idaho should become a law, under its terms it would be entirely feasible, without a strained construction, to say that the swamp lands of the country may be entered in 320-acre patches if swamp lands exist in any of the States to which it applies.

Mr. LODGE. Let me ask the Senator a question.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. CARTER. Certainly.

Mr. LODGE. Is not the purpose of this bill to reach lands which can not be cultivated without irrigation?

Mr. CARTER. That is the purpose, as I understand.

Mr. LODGE. Then why not state it simply in that language in the bill?

Mr. CARTER. I think it should be stated in language so clear and specific as to leave nothing open to construction.

Mr. LODGE. There may be nonirrigable lands which are perfectly cultivable lands and which will grow crops. They may be nonirrigable, but have abundant rainfall.

Mr. CARTER. They may have ample rainfall, but, under the amendment proposed, without some such language as the Senator suggests, the bill would run riot with the part of the public domain remaining undisposed of.

Mr. LODGE. Therefore I think we ought to adopt the phrase of the Senator from North Dakota, which obviously means that this should apply only to lands which can not be cultivated without irrigation.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. CARTER. Certainly.

Mr. SMOOT. I should like to ask the Senator from Montana if he does not think when the word "arid" is incorporated in the bill that that word, in connection with the word "nonirrigable," would apply only to arid lands and not to swamp lands?

Mr. CARTER. I hope I made that very clear to the Senator by contending that the amendment of the Senator from Idaho was absolutely essential to the carrying out of the manifest and announced purpose of the bill.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I should like to say that I am perfectly willing, so far as I am concerned, to accept the word "arid" after the word "of."

Mr. DIXON. "Arid or semiarid."

Mr. SMOOT. No; leave out "semiarid," and just include the word "arid."

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President——

Mr. DIXON. If my colleague will yield to me for a moment——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the senior Senator from Montana yield to the junior Senator from Montana?

Mr. CARTER. I yield.

Mr. DIXON. I think it is known of all men that the technical meaning of the word "arid" is without rainfall; a desert. "Semiarid" is where there is some rainfall, but where the land will not annually produce crops without irrigation. That has been the universal ruling of the General Land Office ever since irrigation was tried in the West.

Mr. KEAN. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Montana a question.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. DIXON. With pleasure.

Mr. KEAN. The Senator designates "arid land" as land which is entirely without rainfall. What land does the Senator think is entirely without rainfall?

Mr. DIXON. I know of none in this country. I do not think the word "arid" has properly any place in the bill. "Semiarid" is the term of limitation which should have been used. If there is any land in the West that is wholly arid, it is land that I have never heard of. The term "semiarid" would have covered the whole case. Except for some land in western North Dakota and some land in the panhandle of Idaho, there is no land in any State mentioned in this bill where the word "nonirrigable" would not absolutely have covered every possible phase of the situation and segregated the irrigable lands from the nonirrigable, which we are trying to reach under the provisions of this bill.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. CARTER. I will yield for a question.

Mr. BORAH. I did not notice the Senator had the floor. I will wait until he gets through.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, the word "arid," as applied to all these lands of the great tables this side of the Rocky Mountains and between the Sierras and the Rockies, is clearly a misnomer. All of the lands known as "arid lands" raise good grass. It has been for a generation recognized that the region known as "the arid region" is the best grazing country ever encountered on the continent. Grass grows luxuriantly and cures upon the stalk, so that it is said to be true, and I have no doubt it is true, that the cattle will in the winter leave a haystack and go out to eat the grass on the common when the snow will permit them to get at the grass; and the cattle fatten there during the winter season where the snowfall is not such as to prevent them from getting food on the open range. To call a country growing such a luxuriant growth of grass as that country grows "an arid country," is to deal with terms in a very loose and inconsiderate manner. The word "semiarid" may with better propriety be employed. The amount of rainfall and moisture in a given section of country does not even of itself insure the raising of a crop there; it is a question as to the season during which the moisture falls.

The whole purpose of dry farming is to open the pores of the soil, to break the sod so as to permit the little moisture that does fall to remain on the ground, instead of running away in floods. Then dry farming comes into play during the summer time by pulverizing carefully the surface of the soil so as to prevent evaporation. Thus it amounts to a conservation of water that falls in the neighborhood.

I agree fully with my colleague that there is probably nowhere in all the Western country any strictly arid land, except perchance in what is known as the Death Valley in southern Nevada and Arizona, and it sometimes rains in that region. I believe the whole country is overgrown with cactus and sagebrush and other kinds of vegetation which can not grow without some moisture falling at some time.

I should like to see the bill very carefully guarded as to the particular character of land to which it is to apply. The public domain is rapidly becoming settled. There are many people to take up homes and there are few acres left. I should view with regret any law which would give to the few an excessive amount of land and thereby deprive other equally deserving people of an opportunity to make a home or a series of homes on the public domain.

It is true that if the law can be applied strictly to the kind of lands to which Senators have directed their attention, it will prove beneficial; but it should be so guarded that it can not be made the means of absorbing in rapid order, and to no inconsiderable extent for speculative purposes, those portions of the public domain upon which crops can be raised without any special effort or scientific endeavor in the way of dry farming.

I hope the amendment of the Senator from Idaho will be adhered to, and that the word "semiarid" will be inserted, so that no question may be raised as to the land.

Mr. McCUMBER. It seems to me by inserting the word "semiarid" the question is raised, and that is the reason why we are objecting to it. I have no objection to the use of the word "semiarid" provided that we will define in the bill itself the meaning of that word, so that there can be no possible mistake. If we would insert something like this, "semiarid lands shall be construed to mean lands in sections having an insufficient rainfall to raise and mature crops," I would be satisfied with it.

Mr. DIXON. Let me suggest an amendment which I think will cover all the classes of cases. After the word "of" in line 9, page 1, insert:

Arid or semiarid lands that will not successfully produce crops without artificial irrigation.

That will cover the whole scope of the inquiry. In order to get it before the Senate I will move that as an amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Montana proposes an amendment to the amendment of the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. SMOOT. Let the amendment to the amendment be read.

Mr. McCUMBER. Let the section be read with the amendment so that we will understand it.

The SECRETARY. On page 1, line 9, after the word "of" insert:

Arid or semiarid lands that will not successfully produce crops without artificial irrigation.

Mr. TELLER. Would not that mean that a crop shall be produced by irrigation?

Mr. DIXON. It limits the character of lands that can be entered. He can enter semiarid, nonmineral, nonirrigable, unsurveyed, unappropriated public lands, and semiarid lands that can not successfully produce crops without irrigation.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I am of the same opinion as that expressed by the Senator from Colorado, that it would cut out those who intended to pursue dry-farming methods on the ground on which that system of farming is based, namely, that they shall raise only one crop in two years; that the land shall lie fallow one year and conserve the moisture and produce a crop the second year.

As I understand the plan and scheme of this bill, it is to double the amount of land to the farmer who can produce only a possible crop every other year, and therefore it makes him equal to those who can raise a crop every year, so that it will be 160 acres with a crop every year, or 320 acres with a crop once in two years.

I do not think we should rule out the dry-farming interests. There are millions of acres of public domain on which if there ever is to be any outcome, so far as cultivation and settlement are concerned, the land will have to be cultivated and settled under a successful development of the so-called "dry-farming method," because the waters in the arid States, even if stored in reservoirs, will apply irrigation only to a small percentage, a tenth or a twentieth of a quarter, as the case may be, and all the balance must either remain simply a pasture or it must be developed under the system of storing the moisture in the soil as it falls until there is sufficient to produce a crop, which is said to be not oftener than once in two years.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, there is some difficulty in handling these proposed amendments, resulting from the fact that they are not available in writing. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Montana to the amendment which I offered is to insert:

Lands which shall not successfully produce annual crops without artificial irrigation.

That excludes all the lands in the West, because with artificial irrigation they will all produce crops. If this is intended as a statement of a rule for the classification of the land, the bill would be a Barmecide feast. There are no lands in the West where with irrigation—and when you use the term "irrigation" you mean sufficient irrigation—it will not produce crops. What would be left of the bill? What lands would it apply to?

Mr. DIXON. I can not conceive under what theory of reasoning the Senator is proceeding.

Mr. HEYBURN. I will make it plain, I think, in a moment.

Mr. DIXON. The amendment says that semiarid lands which will not successfully produce annual crops without artificial irrigation may be entered.

Mr. HEYBURN. What arid or semiarid lands will not successfully produce crops with irrigation? If the Senator knows of any such lands he has knowledge of some part of the country of which I have no knowledge.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to his colleague?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. BORAH. The amendment is to the effect that he shall not be permitted to enter any lands which will produce crops without artificial irrigation.

Mr. HEYBURN. Which shall not produce crops.

Mr. BORAH. That is not the language of the amendment.

Mr. HEYBURN. Which will not produce crops.

Mr. BORAH. That is, the only land he can enter will be land which will not produce crops without irrigation.

Mr. HEYBURN. State the converse of it. Lands that will produce crops with sufficient irrigation can not be entered. That is the converse. Do you want to allow him to enter lands that will produce crops with irrigation?

Mr. DIXON. Under the amendment he must enter land that will produce crops with irrigation.

Mr. HEYBURN. I think this question ought to be carefully analyzed. With the courtesy of the Senator from Utah, I have the language employed by the junior Senator from Montana in proposing his amendment. In describing the land he says that they shall be "lands which shall not successfully produce annual crops without artificial irrigation."

Mr. DIXON. Yes.

Mr. SMOOT. It seems to me that that is proper, because in the wording of the amendment is "lands which will not successfully produce annual crops without artificial irrigation."

Mr. HEYBURN. Now, excuse me. The converse of that is land that will produce crops with irrigation.

Mr. SMOOT. It has reference to arid and semiarid land which will not succesfully produce annual crops without artificial irrigation. In other words, the class of lands that is arid and semiarid is not possible of irrigation, but it does not say that if irrigated they would not produce a crop.

Mr. HEYBURN. While I have the floor——

Mr. McCUMBER. I think the Senator from Idaho does not correctly state the reverse of that proposition. He states the reverse of the proposition to mean that it would exclude lands that would produce crops with proper irrigation, but that is not correct. It is land which will not successfully produce annual crops without artificial irrigation. The reverse of that is land which will successfully produce crops with artificial irrigation.

Mr. HEYBURN. Without.

Mr. McCUMBER. No; that is where the Senator makes a mistake in changing the bill from the affirmative to the negative.

Mr. HEYBURN. It is easy enough to say a Senator makes a mistake, as the circumstances under which we are conisdering the proposed amendment are not conducive to a very elaborate and plain expression of our understanding, because we always have five minutes ahead of us. Mr. President, is it not obvious at this time that a bill of this importance should not be considered under the five-minute rule in the United States Senate?

Mr. SMOOT. I understand that there is no special hurry this morning about applying the five-minute rule to the consideration of the bill, and if the Senator wants to take a longer time there will be no objection.

Mr. HEYBURN. But we have a rule for the consideration of the bill, and I am inclined to observe it. We may speak five minutes. I am speaking now under the rule to an amendment. I had exhausted my right to discuss the bill in five minutes. I may speak five minutes upon this amendment, I understand, under the rule. I will ask the Chair if I am correct in my understanding of it. Does the five-minute limitation include the bill and the amendments?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The rule is very plain. It says:

> At the conclusion of the morning business for each day, unless upon motion the Senate shall at any time otherwise order, the Senate will proceed to the consideration of the Calendar of Bills and Resolutions, and continue such consideration until 2 o'clock; and bills and resolutions that are not objected to shall be taken up in their order, and each Senator shall be entitled to speak once and for five minutes only upon any question.

Mr. HEYBURN. "Upon any question." Then I am infringing upon the rules of the Senate.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. By unanimous consent the Senator from Idaho can proceed in order.

Mr. HEYBURN. I am not asking unanimous consent for an extension of time.

Mr. KEAN. I trust the Senator will proceed. We are all glad to hear the Senator from Idaho, and no one is trying to take him off his feet.

Mr. HEYBURN. That is very courteous and I appreciate it, but I feel sometimes as though I would prefer to proceed because of our right to proceed upon this question. It has not been half considered. There are twenty questions that arise upon the consideration of the bill that have not been suggested, and you are turning loose probably 200,000,000 acres of land for settlement of some kind under the bill. I ask that it may go over under Rule IX.

Mr. DIXON. I am well aware the Senator from Idaho has objections to the theory of the legislation more than to its present consideration. I should like to ask the consent of the Senate that the bill, on account of its extreme importance to every State west of the one hundredth meridian be made the special order for to-morrow after the morning business.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Montana asks unanimous consent that the bill under consideration be made the special business for to-morrow morning after the close of the routine morning business. Is there objection?

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President——

Mr. DIXON. Not to interfere with any appropriation bill.

Mr. WARREN. Except appropriation bills.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Not to interfere with appropriation bills. Is there objection? The Chair hears none and it is so ordered. The next bill on the Calendar will be announced.

OMNIBUS CLAIMS BILL.

The bill (H. R. 15372) for the allowance of certain claims reported by the Court of Claims under the provisions of the acts approved March 3, 1883, and March 3, 1887, and commonly known as the Bowman and the Tucker acts, was announced as the next in order.

Mr. KEAN. Let the bill go over.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask that the bill may go over without prejudice.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will go over without prejudice at the request of the Senator from Utah.

CHEYENNE RIVER AND STANDING ROCK INDIAN RESERVATIONS.

The bill (S. 1385) to authorize the sale and disposition of a portion of the surplus and unallotted lands in the Cheyenne River and Standing Rock Indian reservations, in the State of South Dakota, and making appropriation and provision to carry the same into effect, was announced as next in order.

Mr. McCUMBER. I ask that the bill may go over.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will go over at the request of the Senator from North Dakota.

LANDS OF ROSEBUD RESERVATION, S. DAK.

The bill (S. 6303) authorizing the allotment of lands to certain Sioux Indians of the Rosebud Reservation, in the State of South Dakota, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. GORE. I should like to ask who is the author of the bill?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill was introduced by the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. GAMBLE].

Mr. GAMBLE. The bill was prepared by the Department. The act of Congress of March 1, 1907, allowed allotments to be made to all minor children upon reservations in South Dakota, and on March 2 a law was passed opening the surplus lands on the Rosebud Reservation within the limits of Tripp County, which permitted allotments to be made to the Indians upon that reservation who were then living. It limited the general law as applied to all the reservations. This is simply to put the law back to where it was on the 1st day of March, 1907, and permit allotments to be made to minor children in South Dakota upon these particular reservations as long as there are surplus lands upon which allotments can be made.

Mr. GORE. Is it a Senate or a House bill?

Mr. GAMBLE. It is a Senate bill. It applies only to lands in the State of South Dakota.

Mr. GORE. It was introduced by the Senator?

Mr. GAMBLE. It was introduced by myself.

Mr. GORE. I have a bill pending authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to allot land to one Herman Lehman (Montechema) in the Kiowa and Comanche reservations in the State of Oklahoma. The bill has the approval of the Secretary of the Interior and the Indian Department. I want to offer it as an amendment to this bill if it would not be objectionable to the author of the bill. I do not want to embarrass the bill, and I do not think it would, because the bill I have pending is approved by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs. If the Senator has no objection I should like to offer it as an amendment to this bill.

Mr. GAMBLE. Of course, I would very much prefer that the bill should not be amended. It is a local matter and applies entirely to the Indians upon this particular reservation. Allotments are now being made to minor children, but under the act of March 2, 1907, opening a part of the lands, Indian allottees are permitted to change their allotments. This bill ought to become a law, and I am afraid if amendments are added it would delay it and probably defeat its passage. I very much prefer that the other bill should proceed in its regular way rather than have it as an amendment upon what is purely a local measure.

Mr. CULBERSON. Let the report be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the report at the request of the Senator from Texas.

The Secretary read the report submitted by Mr. GAMBLE, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, April 1, 1908, as follows:

> Mr. GAMBLE, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 6303) authorizing the allotment of lands to certain Rosebud Sioux Indian children in the State of South Dakota, having had the same under consideration, submits the following report, and recommends that the bill do pass.
>
> The accompanying communication from the Secretary of the Interior is submitted as a part of this report, which states fully the necessities for the passage of the measure and reasons why the same should become a law:
>
> DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
> Washington, February 7, 1908.
> SIR: The act of March 1, 1907 (34 Stat. L., 1015, 1048), provides: "That hereafter the President shall cause allotments to be made under the provisions of said act (the act of March 2, 1889, 25 Stat. L., 888) to any living children of Indians affected thereby who have not heretofore been allotted: Provided, That the tribe to which said Indian children belong is possessed of any unallotted tribal or reservation lands."
> The effect of this act was to authorize allotments to be made to children of Indians belonging on any of the great Sioux reservations so long as the tribe inhabiting the reservation on which they were entitled to receive an allotment was possessed of tribal land. This affected the Standing Rock, Cheyenne River, Lower Brulé, Crow Creek, Pine Ridge, and Rosebud reservations, in South Dakota, and Standing Rock Reservation, in North Dakota.

The act of March 2, 1907 (34 Stat. L., 1230), provides inter alia for the allotment of—

"One hundred and sixty acres of land to each child of Indian parentage whose father or mother is or was, in case of death, a duly enrolled member of the Sioux tribe of Indians belonging on the Rosebud Reservation who is living at the time of the passage and approval of this act and who has not heretofore received an allotment."

The effect of the wording of this act was to limit the provisions of the act of March 1, 1907, so far as it affected the children of Indians belonging on the Rosebud Reservation to those who were born at the date of the passage of the act; and while the act of March 1, 1907, which is general in its character, provided that the children of Indians belonging on the Rosebud Reservation should receive allotments as long as that tribe was possessed of reservation lands, this provision was in effect repealed so far as it related to the Rosebud Reservation and resulted in discrimination against the children of Indians belonging on the Rosebud Reservation, which, in my opinion, should not exist. I have therefore caused to be prepared a draft of a bill which reenacts the provisions of the act of March 1, 1907, so as to make them applicable to the children of the Rosebud Reservation, and respectfully recommend that it be enacted into law.

Very respectfully, JAMES RUDOLPH GARFIELD, Secretary.

THE SPEAKER OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

A bill.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he hereby is, authorized to cause allotments to be made under the provisions of the act of March 2, 1898, entitled "An act to divide a portion of the reservation of the Sioux Nation in Dakota into separate reservations and secure the relinquishment of the Indian title to the remainder, and for other purposes," to any living children of the Sioux tribe of Indians belonging on the Rosebud Reservation affected thereby, and who have not heretofore been allotted, so long as that tribe is in possession of any unallotted tribal or reservation lands.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

COMPANIES B, C, AND D, TWENTY-FIFTH INFANTRY.

The next bills on the Calendar were the bill (S. 5729) to correct the records and authorize the reenlistment of certain noncommissioned officers and enlisted men belonging to Companies B, C, and D of the Twenty-fifth United States Infantry who were discharged without honor under Special Orders, No. 266, War Department, November 9, 1906, and the restoration to them of all rights of which they have been deprived on account thereof, and the bill (S. 6206) for the relief of certain former members of the Twenty-fifth Regiment of United States Infantry.

Mr. LODGE. Let the bills go over under Rule IX.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

FISH-CULTURAL STATION IN TEXAS.

The bill (S. 6234) for the establishment of a fish-cultural station in Texas was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to appropriate $25,000 for the establishment of a fish-cultural station in the State of Texas, including the purchase of site, construction of buildings and ponds, and equipment, at some suitable point to be selected by the Secretary of Commerce and Labor.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. GAMBLE. On page 7, beginning with line 24, the paragraph reads:

The name of Thomas G. Orr, late of Company C, Fifth Regiment Iowa Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $30 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

I move to amend the amendment by striking out the word "thirty" and inserting the word "forty" before "dollars."

Mr. KEAN. I ask whether that is a committee amendment. We all have that kind of amendments which we should like to have made.

Mr. LODGE rose.

Mr. GAMBLE. I will say to the Senator from Massachusetts and the Senator from New Jersey that I called the attention of the chairman of the Committee on Pensions to this amendment last week. This is an extreme case, and the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] suggested to me that when the matter came up before the Senate I should call attention to it; and I feel justified in doing so, even though he may not be here.

Mr. LODGE. Let the bill go over.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will go over without prejudice.

Mr. GAMBLE. I do not want to stand in the way of the general bill, but I felt justified in offering the amendment to the amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will go over without prejudice at the request of the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. MCCUMBER subsequently said: I understand that the bill (H. R. 1589) granting an increase of pension to Susan M. Yeoman was passed over in my absence. I should like to call it up and proceed with its consideration.

The Senate as in Committee of the Whole resumed the consideration of the bill.

Mr. MCCUMBER. The Senator from South Dakota [Mr. GAMBLE] has an amendment which he desires to have made, in which I concur.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. GAMBLE] to the amendment of the committee will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 8, line 1, after the words "at the rate of," it is proposed to strike out the word "thirty" and insert the word "forty," so as to read:

The name of Thomas G. Orr, late of Company C, Fifth Regiment Iowa Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $40 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the civil war, and to certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors."

The bill (H. R. 17874) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the civil war and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers of said war was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Pensions with amendments.

The first amendment was, on page 6, line 3, before the word "dollars," to strike out "thirty" and insert "twenty-seven," so as to make the paragraph read:

The name of Solomon C. Grim, late of Company D, Ninety-second Regiment Illinois Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $27 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 11, line 9, before the word "dollars," to strike out "thirty" and insert "forty," so as to make the paragraph read:

The name of Marion B. Patterson, widow of Robert F. Patterson, late lieutenant-colonel Twenty-ninth Regiment Iowa Volunteer Infantry, and pay her a pension at the rate of $40 per month in lieu of that she is now receiving.

The amendment was agreed to.

SETTLEMENT OF STATE ACCOUNTS.

USE OF DREDGER AT COOS BAY, OREGON.

had been reported from the Committee on Commerce with an amendment, on page 2, line 1, after the word "in," to strike out "dredging and improving the channel of Coos Bay, aforesaid," and to insert "maintaining channel depths and dredging in the inner harbor," so as to make the joint resolution read:

Resolved, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to employ and devote the unexpended balance of the appropriation heretofore made for the improvement of the entrance to Coos Bay and harbor, in the State of Oregon, namely, the sum of $25,225.99, or so much thereof as may be necessary, in operating the dredger which is now being constructed for use at the coast harbors of Oregon and Washington in maintaining channel depths and dredging in the inner harbor.

Mr. KEAN. Do I understand this joint resolution changes the appropriation made in the river and harbor bill from an appropriation for dredging and improving that harbor to one for buying dredges?

Mr. FRYE. No. There was a balance left over from the improvement of the harbor of $25,000, and the Secretary of War recommends that it may be used for keeping the channel open.

Mr. KEAN. That is entirely satisfactory; but I do not believe in the United States Government going into the dredging business except under contract.

Mr. FRYE. The Government has the dredge there already.

Mr. KEAN. I think we have too many of them. They ought to be owned by private individuals, and not by the Government.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment reported by the committee.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. GAMBLE. Regular order, Mr. President.

Mr. BURKETT. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 4032) to establish the direction and control of public education in the District of Columbia.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Nebraska moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill named by him.

Mr. GAMBLE. Mr. President——

Mr. NELSON. That would displace the regular order.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The effect of the motion of the Senator from Nebraska, if adopted, would be as the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] indicates. The Senator from Nebraska moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill, the title of which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 4032) to establish the direction and control of public education in the District of Columbia.

Mr. CULBERSON. I thought we were on the Calendar under Rule VIII, Mr. President.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senate is on the Calendar under Rule IX.

The motion was not agreed to.

SETTLEMENT OF STATE ACCOUNTS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 415) regulating the settlement of the accounts between the United States and the several States relative to the disposition of the public lands, and for other purposes.

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. President, at the time of the adjournment the other day on this matter the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON], I think, had the floor. If he has nothing further to say on the subject, I should like to be recognized to oppose the amendment.

Mr. CLAY. I think, Mr. President, that my colleague at the time of the adjournment of the Senate had asked for the report of the Committee on Claims to be read, and my recollection is that at the time the Secretary began to read the report the Senate went into executive session. My colleague has informed me that he would be glad to have that report read.

Mr. GAMBLE. I will say to the Senator from Georgia that the report was largely read.

Mr. BACON. I beg the Senator's pardon; the report was not read at all.

Mr. GAMBLE. A large part of the report upon this bill, Senate bill No. 415, was read.

Mr. CLAY. The Senator from South Dakota misunderstood me. A large part of the report on this bill was read, but my colleague asked that the report in reference to this amendment which he offered should be read. That amendment had been before a committee where it had been carefully considered and reported to the Senate, and my colleague asked that that report be read. That is my recollection.

Mr. GAMBLE. I simply misunderstood the Senator. I thought he referred to the report accompanying the bill.

Mr. CLAY. No; I did not have reference to that at all.

Mr. HOPKINS. As I have said, when we adjourned the other day, I think the senior Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] had the floor. I desire to oppose the amendment; and if the Senator has the floor now, if he desires to say nothing further and will yield to me, I will proceed.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, at the time the Senate went into executive session the other day this bill was under consideration. The amendment had been offered by me and was pending, and in the course of my remarks, and before I had concluded my remarks, I asked that the House report which had been made upon the bill, which is the same as the amendment offered by me, should be read. It was about to be read when the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] moved that the Senate go into executive session. I now ask, Mr. President, that the report be read, again stating that I make this request and desire that it shall be read because of the fact that it is a very clear statement of the grounds upon which the propriety of the passage of this act is rested, with historical narration of the events out of which the claim grows and with citations from the Supreme Court in the cases in which they have decided that this money does not belong to the Government of the United States, but that it does belong to certain parties, for whom the Government holds it in trust. I prefer that the report should be read for two reasons: In the first place, it reflects the opinion of a committee, and is entitled to superior consideration to what I might say individually, and, in the second place, it is a more succinct and clear statement of the case than I or possibly anyone else could make orally to the Senate.

Now, Mr. President, without yielding the floor, except for that purpose, I ask that the report may be read to the Senate, and I do trust that Senators will listen to the report, because, as I said the other day, it is incomprehensible to me how any Senator who hears this report and who weighs the words of it and also weighs the words of the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States can possibly deny the propriety of that which is sought to be accomplished by this amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

Mr. LAW, from the Committee on War Claims, submitted the following report:

[To accompany H. R. 16732.]

The Committee on War Claims have considered the bill (H. R. 16732) to give the Court of Claims jurisdiction of claims for captured and abandoned property which was sold and the proceeds thereof placed in the Treasury of the United States, and submits the following report and recommends that said bill do pass:

By the act of March 12, 1863, known as the "captured and abandoned property act," and acts amendatory thereof, the Secretary of the Treasury was authorized to appoint special agents to collect captured and abandoned property in the States then in insurrection, the proceeds thereof to be paid into the Treasury of the United States. The act provided that the property to be collected under it "shall not include any kind or description which has been used, or which has been intended to be used, for waging or carrying on war against the United States, such as arms, ordnance, ships, steamboats, or other water craft, and the furniture, forage, military supplies, or munitions of war."

Nine districts were established, and an agent appointed for each. A large amount of property in the States in insurrection was seized and the proceeds, amounting to over $30,000,000, reported to the Secretary of the Treasury. The money was treated as a trust fund under the control of the Secretary. Under joint resolution approved March 30, 1868, it was provided that all moneys derived from the sale of captured and abandoned property "which have not already been actually covered into the Treasury shall immediately be paid into the Treasury of the United States." The balance covered into the Treasury under this resolution was $20,971,790.96.

The third section of the act of March 12, 1863, provided as follows:

"Any person claiming to have been the owner of any such abandoned or captured property may, at any time within two years after the suppression of the rebellion, prefer his claim to the proceeds thereof in the Court of Claims; and on proof to the satisfaction of said court of his ownership of said property, of his right to the proceeds thereof, and that he has never given any aid or comfort to the present rebellion, to receive the residue of such proceeds, after the deduction of any purchase money which may have been paid, together with the expense of transportation and sale of such property, and any other lawful expenses attending the disposition thereof." (12 Stat. L., 820.)

Under this provision a considerable number of claims were preferred to the Court of Claims and judgments recovered.

The following is believed to be a substantially correct statement of the payments that have been made from the amount covered into the Treasury under the said resolution of March 30, 1868:

On judgments under act of March 12, 1863	$9, 852, 956. 95
On judgments against Treasury agents	65, 276. 79
Disbursed for expenses under joint resolution of March 30, 1868	242, 140. 34
Paid on special acts of relief	451, 125. 38
Paid by Secretary of Treasury under act of May 18, 1872	195, 896. 21
On judgment Court of Claims, Duffy, Report C. C., 24275	15, 270. 00
Under private act, 25 Stat., p. 1310	32, 669. 20
Under private act to Briggs, paid March 24, 1894	88, 104. 21
Total	10, 943, 439. 08

Deducting the above amount from the amount covered into the Treasury under the resolution of March 30, 1868, it will be seen that the sum now in the Treasury, and undisposed of, is $10,028,351.88.

The sole purpose of this bill is to extend the limitation upon the jurisdiction of the Court of Claims for a period of two years to entertain suits to recover the proceeds of the property of claimants where it can be established that such proceeds were actually covered into the Treasury of the United States under the act of March 12, 1863, and the acts amendatory thereof, and at the same time to safeguard every right and proper interest of the Government. This money does not belong to the Government. Proper legislation should be enacted with a view to distributing same to its owners.

Many questions arose under the act of March 12, 1863, such as, "What constituted proof of loyalty?" "When was the rebellion suppressed?" and "When did the two years expire within which suit could be commenced?" All of which were vigorously contested, and in which the court ruled strictly and rigidly against the claimants, rendering appeals to the Supreme Court necessary, and by which the owners of the property were delayed or deterred from preferring their claims under the act.

In December, 1869, the Supreme Court of the United States decided, in Anderson v. The United States (9 Wall., 56), that the rebellion was suppressed on the 20th of August, 1866, the date of President Johnson's proclamation of pardon and amnesty, with restoration of civil and political rights, and the limitation of the right to commence suit took effect or expired on the 20th of August, 1868. And it thus appears that the period in which the claimants could bring suit to recover the net proceeds of their property had expired more than one year prior to the decision fixing the date of the close of the war was announced and when it was too late for the claimants to derive any benefit from the decision.

It was not till 1871 that the Supreme Court gave full consideration to this act of March 12, 1863. In December of that year, in the case of Klein v. The United States (13 Wall., 128), the court decided—

(1) That it was not the intention of Congress by the enactment of that statute that the title to property seized under it should be divested from the loyal owners.

(2) That the proceeds of the property should go into the Treasury without change of ownership.

(3) That the same intention prevailed in regard to the property of owners who, though then hostile, might subsequently become loyal.

(4) That it was for the Government itself to determine whether those proceeds should be restored to the owner or not.

(5) That the President's proclamation of pardon and amnesty, with restoration of rights of property, and particularly that of July 4, 1868, was a decision on the part of the Government which decided affirmatively the right of the owners of such property to the proceeds thereof in the Treasury, and the restoration of the proceeds became the absolute right of the persons pardoned.

(6) And that "the Government constituted itself the trustee for those who by that act were declared entitled to the proceeds of captured and abandoned property, and for those whom it should thereafter recognize as entitled."

And in its opinion the court uses this language:

"That it was not the intention of Congress that the title to these proceeds should be divested absolutely out of the original owners of the property seems clear upon a comparison of different parts of the act.

"We have already seen that those articles which became by the simple fact of capture the property of the captor, as ordnance, munitions of war, and the like, or in which third parties acquired rights which might be made absolute by decree, as ships and other vessels captured as prize, were expressly excepted from the operation of the act, and it is reasonable to infer that it was the purpose of Congress that the proceeds of the property for which the special provision of the act was made should go into the Treasury without change of ownership. Certainly such was the intention in respect to the property of loyal men. That the same intention prevailed in regard to the property of owners who, though then hostile, might subsequently become loyal, appears probable from the circumstances that no provision is anywhere made for confiscation of it, while there is no trace in the statute book of intention to divest ownership of private property not excepted from the effect of this act otherwise than by proceedings for confiscation.

"It is thus seen that, except as to property used in actual hostilities, as mentioned in the first section of the act of March 12, 1863, no titles were divested in the insurgent States unless in pursuance of a judgment rendered after due legal proceedings. The Government recognized to the fullest extent the humane maxims of the modern law of nations, which exempt private property of noncombatant enemies from capture as booty of war. Even the law of confiscation was sparingly applied. The cases were few indeed in which the property of any not engaged in actual hostilities was subjected to seizure and sale.

"We conclude, therefore, that the title to the proceeds of the property which came to the possession of the Government by capture or abandonment, with the exceptions already noticed, was in no case divested from the original owner. It was for the Government itself to determine whether these proceeds should be restored to the owner or not. The promise of the restoration of all rights of property decided that question affirmatively as to all persons who availed themselves of the proffered pardon * * *.

"The restoration of the proceeds became the absolute right of the persons pardoned on application within two years from the close of the war. It was, in fact, promised for an equivalent. 'Pardon and restoration of political rights' were 'in return' for the oath and its fulfillment."

And then the court adds this strong language:

"To refuse it would be a breach of faith not less cruel and astounding than to abandon the freed people whom the Executive had promised to maintain in their freedom."

And in the prior case of The United States v. Padelford (9 Wall., 531) the court held that under the proclamation of pardon issued by President Lincoln, dated December 8, 1863, and the act of March 12, 1863, the Government is a trustee, holding the proceeds of the petitioner's property for his benefit, and having been fully reimbursed for all expenses incurred in that character, loses nothing by the judgment, which simply awards to the petitioner what is his own.

This decision in the Klein case settled the important questions in relation to the owners of captured and abandoned property and their rights under the act of March 12, 1863, and subsequent statutes relating to that subject, and it left nothing for Congress to do but provide a tribunal to which claimants might resort to establish their absolute right, in the language of the Supreme Court, to their share of the fund derived from the sale of such property.

In June, 1873, the case of Haycraft v. The United States was commenced in the Court of Claims to recover the net proceeds of certain property of the claimant. The suit was brought more than two years after the suppression of the rebellion, upon the theory that, as the Government held those proceeds in trust, as decided in the Klein case, it was liable outside of the act of March 12, 1863, upon an implied promise to pay to the claimant his portion of the fund; but the Court of Claims decided that the provision in that act limiting the right of the claimant to two years in which to prefer his claim was a limitation upon its jurisdiction, and thereupon it dismissed the petition. In January, 1875, this decision was affirmed by the Supreme Court, which held that the question was one of jurisdiction and not of limitation, and that Congress having legislated upon the subject, the Court of Claims did not possess jurisdiction to entertain suits of this character under an implied contract to refund to claimants the net proceeds of their property in the Treasury. (Haycraft v. The United States, 22 Wall., 81.)

While the Haycraft case was pending in the Court of Claims, and before its decision by the Supreme Court, a large number of suits were commenced in the former court upon the theory on which the Haycraft case was based, viz, that the Government was liable to the claimants for the net proceeds of their property, under an implied contract, and these cases were all continued upon the dockets of the court till the decision of the Supreme Court to which we have referred, when they were all dismissed for want of jurisdiction.

Here, then, was the difficulty which existed—parties having rights which they were unable to enforce, for the reason that there was no tribunal to which to resort for their enforcement. It requires no argument to prove that a right may exist where there is no remedy for its enforcement; and this was, and is to-day, the precise predicament of all persons claiming an interest in the captured and abandoned property fund. While the power of the Court of Claims in the premises had ceased to exist, the rights of the claimants had survived; and neither the court nor the claimants, in order to enable each to act, require anything more than this: The one the privilege to sue and the other the right to entertain and determine such suits.

To remedy the wrong which existed in this respect, and in order to make effective the decisions of the Supreme Court to which reference has been made, Congress enacted section 1059 of the Revised Statutes, giving the Court of Claims jurisdiction of four classes of claims. The fourth clause of said section reads as follows:

"Fourth. Of all claims for the proceeds of captured or abandoned property, as provided by the act of March 12, 1863, chapter 120, entitled "An act to provide for the collection of abandoned property and for the prevention of frauds in insurrectionary districts within the United States," or by the act of July 2, 1864, chapter 225, being an act in addition thereto: Provided, That the remedy given in cases of seizure under the said acts, by preferring claim in the Court of Claims, shall be exclusive, precluding the owner of any property taken by agents of the Treasury Department as abandoned or captured property, in virtue or under color of said acts, from suit at common law, or any other mode or redress whatever, before any court other than the Court of Claims.

And Congress provided for the payment of any judgment the court might render in favor of claimants under said fourth clause by section 3689 of the Revised Statutes, which, under the head of "Permanent annual appropriations," among other things, provides as follows:

"For the return of proceeds from the sale of captured and abandoned property in insurrectionary districts to the owners thereof, who may, to the satisfaction of the Court of Claims, prove their right to and ownership of said property."

These provisions of the Revised Statutes construed together provided a complete and adequate remedy for the claimants under the act of March 12, 1863, and subsequent statutes relating to the subject. The statutes declare this was the law on the 1st of December, 1873, though they were not approved by the President till June 22, 1874, and were not published till in 1875. These provisions of the statutes were in force, though not published, when the Haycraft case, above cited, was decided by the Supreme Court, and it can hardly be doubted that the decision in that case would have been different if the court had been aware of the existence of the two clauses in sections 1059 and 3689 of the Revised Statutes.

To every unprejudiced mind the language of the fourth clause of section 1059 is clear and unambiguous, and requires no construction to arrive at the intention of the National Legislature. It could have had but one object, and that was to confer upon the Court of Claims a jurisdiction which had once existed and which Congress well knew had expired by limitation. While the provision confers no new rights upon those claiming the fund derived from the sale of their property, but, on the contrary, restricts those rights by making the jurisdiction exclusive, it provides a tribunal before which they can go to enforce existing rights, and that tribunal one specially provided for adjudicating claims against the Government. Acting upon the assumption that the Government can not be sued without its consent, the legal effect of the clause is to give that consent, with the proviso that the claimants shall be confined in the prosecution of their claims to the provisions of the acts of March 12, 1863, and July 2, 1864—that is to say, that they should only recover the net proceeds of the sale of their property after deducting all costs and charges. And this conclusion is strengthened when section 3689 is construed in connection with section 1059.

The act of March 12, 1863, provided for the payment of all judgments rendered under its provisions, and if by the fourth clause of section 1059 it was only intended to continue the jurisdiction of the Court of Claims as to suits then pending before it, then no additional legislation was necessary to provide for the payment of any judgments rendered by the court in favor of the claimants. Besides, the limitation of two years in the act of March 12, 1863, operated upon the claimants rather than upon the court. It gave them the two years in which to prefer their claims to the proceeds of their property, and the act nowhere provided that the jurisdiction of the court should terminate in two years, whether the cases then pending were disposed of or not. But when Congress came to confer a new jurisdiction upon the court, without limitation as to time in which suits might be commenced, in order to make the remedy effective it was necessary to make provision for the payment of any judgments obtained by the claimants, and this Congress did by the enactment of section 3689 of the Revised Statutes.

The Court of Claims, however, adhering to its habit of ruling rigidly against claimants in that court, took a different view of sections 1059 and 3689, and in the case of Mary A. Wade, administratrix, and B. M. Martel, syndic, held that Congress did not intend by the above sections to repeal the two years' limitation in the act of March 12, 1863, and that these sections would not admit of such a construction, thus placing Congress in the ridiculous attitude of conferring jurisdiction upon the court and in the same clause limiting that jurisdiction to a period of time which had expired five years previously. This decision is based upon the ground "that the object of the revision of the statutes was not to change existing law, but to revise, simplify, arrange, and consolidate all statutes of the United States, general and permanent in their nature, which shall be in force at the time the commissioners should make the final report of their doings," and that the commissioners, "instead of reenacting the full language, for conciseness and condensation merely referred to the act and provided that the court should have jurisdiction of all claims for the proceeds of captured or abandoned property, as provided in the act of March 12, 1863."

Without stopping to criticise further this decision of the Court of Claims, it is sufficient to say that it completely nullifies the fourth clause of section 1059 of the Revised Statutes and defeats the will of the law-making power as expressed by that provision of the law. So long as that decision stands, even were there no other obstacles in the way, no suits can be maintained in the Court of Claims for the recovery of any portion of the captured and abandoned property fund, and the doors of that court, as well as all other legal tribunals, are closed against the claimants.

This is the condition and state of the law bearing upon this subject at this time as construed and defined by the courts, and it seems apparent that if this captured and abandoned property fund is ever to be distributed to its owners some additional legislation is necessary to that end. If the title of the owners of the property seized and sold under the captured and abandoned property acts has never been divested, if the Government holds the net proceeds of the property thus sold without any legal title thereto and as trustee for the owners, and if the President's proclamation of pardon and amnesty, including restoration to civil and political right, was a decision on the part of the Government which decided affirmatively the right of all owners of the property to the proceeds thereof in the Treasury, as the highest judicial tribunal of the nation has decided, then in equity and good conscience it ought not to retain the money, and the honor and dignity of the nation demand that some provision should be made by which the claimants of the fund may be enabled to enforce their rights thereto. For more than thirty years the Government has had the use of this money.

For more than forty years the claimants have been appealing to Congress for relief, and if Congress in the discharge of more pressing duties has neglected this appeal, or if the remedy it provided has proved inefficacious, the stronger the reason for some action in this direction at the present time. The claimants are fast passing away, leaving as an inheritance to their children the prospect of litigation with their Government; and the witnesses upon whom the claimants must depend to establish their rights are being scattered and lost sight of, and to delay further is simply to rob and deprive these parties of their rights, some of whom are widows and orphans, while others are colored, or men of small means.

That Congress has from time to time felt the necessity for making some provision for the disposition of this fund is evident from the fact that at nearly every session special acts have been enacted for the benefit of claimants of this fund, thus doing justice to some at the expense of others; and it seems to your committee that common justice demands that a general law should be enacted by which all claimants to the fund may be relegated to some tribunal where they can establish their rights according to legal methods and each receive that portion of the fund to which he shows himself entitled.

Time and again favorable reports have been made by one House or the other upon bills having in view the same purpose as the bill now under consideration. In the Fifty-second Congress, first session, the Judiciary Committee of this House made such report on H. R. 455 (Report No. 1377).

In the Fifty-third Congress, second session, the Judiciary Committee upon a number of bills of like character adopted a report of the same committee made in the preceding Congress.

The same in the Fifty-fourth Congress, second session (H. Rep. No. 2568, from the Committee on War Claims, on H. R. 7618).

The same in the Fifty-fifth Congress, third session (S. Rep. No. 1634).

The same in the Fifty-seventh Congress, first session (S. Rep. No. 1292).

The same in the Fifty-eighth Congress, second session (S. Rep. No. 1861).

The same in the Fifty-ninth Congress, first session (S. Rep. No. 3290).

The same in the Fifty-ninth Congress, second session (H. Rep. No. 7540, from the Committee on War Claims, on H. R. 25400).

Your committee report back the bill and recommend its passage.

Mr. CULLOM. Who signs the report?

Mr. BACON obtained the floor.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President——

Mr. BACON. I yield to the Senator from Texas.

Mr. CULBERSON. I will state that in the Fifty-sixth Congress a bill similar to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Georgia was introduced by Senator Cushman K. Davis, and a favorable report was made upon the bill by the then Senator from Illinois, Mr. Mason, and the Senator from Florida [Mr. TALIAFERRO]. In the RECORD of January 23, 1900, there appears a short speech in favor of the measure by the then Senator from Minnesota, Mr. Davis, which I ask may be read at the desk.

Mr. CULLOM. May I ask the Senator who made the report which was just read?

Mr. CULBERSON. That is a House report.

Mr. CULLOM. I know it is; but I am anxious to know who made it in the House.

Mr. CULBERSON. It was made by Mr. Law.

Mr. BACON. It is a report of the committee of the House, and a unanimous report.

Mr. CULLOM. So I supposed.

Mr. CULBERSON. I ask that the speech of Senator DAVIS may be read by the Secretary.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HEYBURN in the chair). In the absence of objection the Secretary will read as requested.

Mr. CULBERSON. It begins at the top of page 1068 and ends at the bottom of page 1069.

The Secretary read as follows:

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, about a year ago my attention was called to these claims, and I gave them and their history a very careful examination. The result of that examination was that I came to the conclusion that they were not only just, but that it was the bounden duty of Congress to provide for their settlement. I will proceed to state in a very brief way what the history of this business has been and what led me to that conclusion.

Mr. HALE. Let me ask the Senator a question before he goes on with his statement. I notice in reading the bill that it is provided that judgments under the bill shall be paid not as ordinarily by appropriations made by Congress, but out of the fund of captured and abandoned property. Will this bill under any circumstances or any construction cover what have been known and what have been discussed heretofore as the captured and abandoned property claims in the South, for cotton and other kinds of property?

Mr. DAVIS. I think it does.

Mr. HALE. The Senator thinks it covers them?

Mr. DAVIS. Yes, sir.

Mr. HALE. That, Mr. President, amounts to ninety or a hundred million dollars.

Mr. DAVIS. But the amount of the disbursement is strictly limited to the fund in the Treasury.

Mr. HALE. Undoubtedly.

Mr. DAVIS. If the Senator will let me go on now—

Mr. HALE. The Senator has answered my question. I did not suppose it covered the question of captured and abandoned cotton.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, in regard to the captured and abandoned cotton, the claim is strictly limited to what the property produced. In 1863 an act of Congress was passed as to captured and abandoned property, by which it was provided that it should be sold and the proceeds, after paying the expenses of the sale and transportation, should be deposited in the Treasury as a fund, and that within two years from the ending of the rebellion parties having claims could bring their suits in the Court of Claims for the purpose of obtaining judgment against the fund; provided, however, that they should make proof of loyalty, that they had never given aid or comfort to the rebellion.

The result of it was that the net fund produced by the sale of this captured and abandoned property—and I can not impress upon Senators too strongly the fact that this bill is limited to that fund—was $20,000,000 in round numbers. Under the act of Congress to which I have referred, where loyalty had to be proved and where the limitation was two years, suits were brought whereby judgments against that fund of $20,000,000 were rendered for about $9,000,000, and which judgments were paid out of that fund.

In the meantime the two years had elapsed. The provisions in regard to the proof of loyalty were kept in force. Many people whose property unquestionably had gone into this fund were not able to make the proof requisite. They were barred by limitation, and for other reasons. They had not brought their suit, or the suit, if brought, had been thrown out, some on the ground of limitation and some on the ground that they had not furnished proof that they had not given aid and comfort to the rebellion.

So, Mr. President, that fund is in the Treasury, not Government property, not money of the United States at all, a fund impressed by a trust for the Federal Government, which is its holder, to which citizens have been declared to be entitled by a decision of the Supreme Court, to which I shall presently call the attention of the Senate. It remains there and has remained there for twenty years, the Government having the use of it since the statute of limitations barred it in 1868, I think.

Now, in regard to the nature of this property and the relations of the Government to it, whether it has been covered into the Treasury, to use the common expression, or whether it was a fund impressed by trust, there was much discussion and considerable litigation, until it finally came before the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Klein v. United States, reported in 13 Wall., 138; and it was held:

"1. That it was not the intention of Congress, by the enactment of that statute, that the title to property seized under it should be divested from the loyal owners.

"2. That the proceeds of the property should go into the Treasury without change of ownership.

"3. That the same intention prevailed in regard to the property of owners who, though then hostile, might subsequently become loyal.

"4. That it was for the Government itself to determine whether those proceeds should be restored to the owner or not.

"5. That the President's proclamation of pardon and amnesty, with restoration of rights of property, and particularly that of July 4, 1868, was a decision on the part of the Government which decided affirmatively the right of all the owners of such property to the proceeds thereof in the Treasury; and the restoration of the proceeds became the absolute right of the persons pardoned.

"6. And that 'the Government constituted itself the trustee for those who by that act were declared entitled to the proceeds of captured and abandoned property, and for those whom it should thereafter recognize as entitled.'"

In this opinion the court used this language:

"That it was not the intention of Congress that the title to these proceeds should be divested absolutely out of the original owners of the property seems clear upon a comparison of different parts of the act.

"We have already seen that those articles which became by the simple fact of capture the property of the captor, as ordnance, munitions of war, and the like, or in which third parties acquired rights which might be made absolute by decree, as ships and other vessels captured as prize, were expressly excepted from the operation of the act; and it is reasonable to infer that it was the purpose of Congress that the proceeds of the property for which the special provision of the act was made should go into the Treasury without change of ownership. Certainly such was the intention in respect to the property of loyal men. That the same intention prevailed in regard to the property of owners who, though then hostile, might subsequently become loyal, appears probable from the circumstances that no provision is anywhere made for confiscation of it, while there is no trace in the statute book of intention to divest ownership of private property not excepted from the effect of this act otherwise than by proceedings for confiscation.

"It is thus seen that, except as to property used in actual hostilities, as mentioned in the first section of the act of March 12, 1863, no titles were divested in the insurgent States, unless in pursuance of a judgment rendered after due legal proceedings. The Goverment recognized to the fullest extent the humane maxims of the modern law of nations, which exempt private property of noncombatant enemies from capture as booty of war; even the law of confiscation was sparingly applied. The cases were few indeed in which the property of any not engaged in actual hostilities was subjected to seizure and sale.

"We conclude, therefore, that the title to the proceeds of the property which came to the possession of the Government by capture or abandonment, with the exceptions already noticed, was in no case divested from the original owner. It was for the Government itself to determine whether these proceeds should be restored to the owner or not. The promise of the restoration of all rights of property decided that question affirmatively as to all persons who availed themselves of the proffered pardon. * * * The restoration of the proceeds became the absolute right of the persons pardoned, on application within two years from the close of the war. It was, in fact, promised an equivalent. 'Pardon and restoration of political rights' were 'in return' for the oath and its fulfillment."

The court adds the following language:

"To refuse it would be a breach of faith not less cruel and astounding than to abandon the freed people whom the Executive had promised to maintain in their freedom."

Mr. President, bearing in mind that up to a certain time there was a limitation upon the right to sue by the necessity to prove loyalty, I ask the attention of the Senate while I give the history of the proceedings by which proof of that fact became entirely immaterial, and in fact could not be required:

"Under the act of July, 1862, known as the confiscation act, the President was authorized at any time thereafter, by proclamation, to extend to persons who may have participated in rebellion in any State or part thereof pardon and amnesty, with such exceptions and at such time and on such conditions as he should deem expedient for the public welfare.

"On the 8th day of December, 1863, the President issued his proclamation, in which he referred to the act of 1863, relating to captured and abandoned property, and offered pardon and amnesty, with restoration of all rights of property, except as to slaves and property to which third persons had acquired rights, to all persons who had participated in the rebellion who would take an oath to support the Constitution and the laws. Certain classes were excepted from the benefits of pardon and amnesty under that proclamation.

"On the 29th of May, 1865, another proclamation was issued, extending pardon and amnesty, with a full restoration of all property rights, except as to slaves, etc., to all persons who had participated in the rebellion. A similar oath was required, and fourteen classes of persons were excepted from the benefits of the proclamation.

"On the 7th of September, 1867, another similar proclamation of pardon and amnesty was issued, which reduced the excepted classes from fourteen to seven.

"Finally—"

And here is the important point, on the 4th day of July, 1868, after the two years' limitation provided for in the act of 1863 had closed upon the parties who otherwise would have been benefited, another similar proclamation of pardon and amnesty was issued, which reduced the excepted classes from fourteen to seven.

"Finally, on the 4th day of July, 1868, a proclamation was issued by the President extending pardon and amnesty to all, with some exceptions, who had participated in the rebellion, with restoration to all rights of property, except in slaves, and on the 25th day of December, 1868, without exception, unconditionally, and without reservation. No oath was required."

Now, what was the situation, Mr. President? Little by little as time went and the feelings of resentment were assuaged, and wiser views and considerations of public policy, as it was then thought, prevailed, by proclamation after proclamation the President granted amnesty, until finally, on the 4th day of July, 1868, a very appropriate day, universal amnesty, without restriction, without qualification, a clean and clear pardon as was ever granted by ruler to men, was issued by the President of the United States, by which no oath of allegiance, proof of loyalty, or disproof of disloyalty were required.

But in what situation did it leave these parties? Those who had remained under the restriction in the previous proclamation or in the statute of 1863, who did not bring their suits because they knew they could not prove loyalty, by the time the proclamation of 1868 was issued had become barred by the statute of limitations. So the word of promise was held forth to the ear, but broken to the hope. A right was declared and a remedy withheld. The Government is in possession of a fund in the Treasury amounting to $9,000,000 which the Supreme Court has declared is still the property of the owners, from whom it has never been divested, as to which the Supreme Court declared this Government held the relation of trustee. It there remained and has remained for twenty years undisposed of, unappropriated, undistributed, the property of private citizens throughout the United States, made perfectly free and clear to claim their rights in the property as I ever was or any other Senator on this floor.

Now I read from the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in the Padelford case, reported in 9 Wallace:

"In the case of Garland this court held the effect of a pardon to be such 'that in the eye of the law the offender is as innocent as if he had never committed the offense;' and in the case of Armstrong's foundry we held that the general pardon granted to him relieved him from a penalty which he had incurred to the United States. It follows that at the time of the seizure of the petitioner's property he was purged of whatever offense against the laws of the United States he had committed by the acts mentioned in the findings and relieved from any penalty which he might have incurred. It follows, further, that if the property had been seized before the oath was taken the faith of the Government was pledged to its restoration upon the taking of the oath in good faith. We can not doubt that the petitioner's right to the property in question at the time of the seizure was perfect, and that it remains perfect, notwithstanding the seizure.

"But it has been suggested that the property was captured in fact, if not lawfully, and that the proceeds having been paid into the Treasury of the United States, the petitioner is without remedy in the Court of Claims, unless proof is made that he gave no aid or comfort to the rebellion. The suggestion is ingenious, but we do not think it sound. The sufficient answer to it is that after the pardon no offense connected with the rebellion can be imputed to him. If in other respects the petitioner made the proof which, under the act, entitled him to a decree for the proceeds of his property, the law makes the proof of pardon a complete substitute for proof that he gave no aid or comfort to the rebellion. A different construction would, as it seems to us, defeat the manifest intent of the proclamation and the act of Congress which authorized it. Under the proclamation and the act the Government is a trustee, holding the proceeds of the petitioner's property for his benefit, and having been fully reimbursed for all expenses incurred in that character loses nothing by the judgment, which simply awards to the petitioner what is his own."

Mr. President, I might go on and cite other decisions cumulative in their nature, but to the same effect. This bill has received the favorable reports of committees in four successive Congresses, I think. The report made last year was made while the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] was chairman of the Committee on Claims. I had some conference with him about it at the time, and he assured me this afternoon of his entire confidence and belief in its perfect justice.

To recapitulate briefly, the situation is just this: There went into the Treasury net $20,000,000, the proceeds of property the title to which had never been divested from the owners, and which has remained and still is a fund representing that property and their title just as much as if it never had been taken from their hands, the Government holding it as a trustee.

This is no mere matter of individual speculation or legislative opinion. Such are the solemn, recorded, and repeated decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States. It was held for a time, so that the loyal owners could recover, and they only, but while that time ran on the Supreme Court said that that which belonged to disloyal owners was held in the same undivested shape of property by the United States as trustee, for the owners who might once have been disloyal might subsequently have become loyal. That time came. Finally, on the 4th day of July, 1868, long after the two years' statute of limitations prescribed by the act of 1863 had closed upon all parties alike, the President of the United States issued a proclamation of general, unconditional, and unrestricted amnesty, which required no oath and put every property owner, loyal or disloyal, in whatever category he might be, upon an equal footing to claim restoration of his property.

But while that was done the statute of limitations had run, and the pending bill is asked for to perfect this act of justice, and no clearer act of justice was ever required of any body of men, in my judgment. When this was done the statute of limitations enacted in 1863 was set up as a bar. Consequently these parties are remediless against a trustee who possesses the power of legislation to open the gates of relief to them. Why should it not be done?

Mr. President, in regard to the apprehension or misapprehension that this bill opens the sluiceway for the letting out of indefinite amounts of money upon so-called "cotton claims," it does nothing of the kind. This bill is limited to the distribution of the $9,000,000 undistributed of that net fund of $20,000,000 which was realized to the Treasury by the capture and sale. That is all there is to it. It sets no precedent whatever for any future legislation as to claims which have not taken the shape of being realized and turned into the Treasury in cash. The kind of claims that have awakened the apprehension of my friend the Senator from Maine are not included, are not contemplated, and can not be covered by this bill.

I have not a particle of interest in this matter more than the general interest and desire to see the right and proper thing done. I do not know that any constituent of mine has the least interest in the world in it. I introduced this bill, the same bill which has been introduced by others before, because upon an examination of what my fellow-citizens were entitled to and what has been denied to them so long by this Government I became thoroughly and perfectly convinced that they were right and were entitled to this measure of long-deferred relief.

Mr. President, I think I have said all I want to say upon this subject.

Mr. WARREN. With the leave of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON], who I understand has the floor, I wish to say that the pending bill is the unfinished business, and not wishing to disturb it, but desiring to take up the Army appropriation bill, I ask the Senator in charge of that bill if he will not lay it temporarily aside that I may call up the Army appropriation bill.

Mr. HOPKINS. When the time comes I desire to submit some remarks in opposition to the amendment. I will not antagonize the consideration of the Army appropriation bill, because I recognize that the appropriation bills should be early considered in the two Houses of Congress. Therefore, if it is agreeable to the Senator from Georgia, I will yield.

Mr. BACON. I had the floor and I signified my consent to the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] that he should make the request of the Senate which he has preferred.

Mr. WARREN. I will say to the Senator from Illinois that the matter will come up exactly as we leave it now, automatically.

Mr. HOPKINS. I understand that it will come up as the unfinished business and I recognize that the appropriation bills should be considered at the earliest practicable moment.

Mr. GAMBLE. With that understanding, let the pending bill be temporarily laid aside.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from South Dakota asks unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside. Without objection, it is so ordered. The Chair lays before the Senate a bill from the House of Representatives.

EMPLOYER'S LIABILITY BILL.

The bill (H. R. 20310) relating to the liability of common carriers by railroads to their employees in certain cases, was read twice by its title.

Mr. DOLLIVER. I ask that the bill may lie on the table. A bill substantially the same has been reported from the Senate committee.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. WARREN. I ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of House bill 17288.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 17288) making appropriation for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1909, which had been reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with amendments.

Mr. WARREN. I ask that the formal reading of the bill may be dispensed with, and that it may be read for action on the committee amendments.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Wyoming asks that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with, that the bill be read for amendment, and that the committee amendments be first considered. Without objection, it is so ordered. The Secretary will proceed with the reading of the bill.

The Secretary proceeded to read the bill.

The first amendment of the Committee on Military Affairs was, on page 2, line 6, after the word "expenses," to insert "including $25 per month additional to regular compension to chief clerk of division for superintendence of the War College building," so as to make the clause read:

Army War College: For expenses of the Army War College, being for the purchase of the necessary stationery, office, toilet, and desk furniture, text-books, books of reference, scientific and professional papers and periodicals, printing and binding, maps, police utensils, and for all other absolutely necessary expenses, including $25 per month additional to regular compensation to chief clerk of division for superintendence of the War College building, $15,000.

Mr. KEAN. I should like to ask for some explanation of the amendment. This is a bill for the support of the Army, and the amendment, the way it reads, seems to be for civilian help, $25 per month additional compensation. I, personally, am not informed as to whether the employees of the War College are included in the legislative appropriation bill.

Mr. WARREN. I will say to the Senator from New Jersey that the legislative appropriation bill carries appropriations for pay of almost all the civil employees, but there have been for years so many of the civilian employees as are on the General Staff and the Staff Corps about the country provided for in this bill.

Mr. KEAN. This is evidently a civilian employee.

Mr. WARREN. Certainly; and always has been provided for in this bill.

Mr. KEAN. But this is an amendment.

Mr. WARREN. The amendment simply provides that a civilian employee mentioned in another place in the bill and in another way shall have for additional duties the additional sum that has been estimated and that is asked for the same as is provided for other superintendents of public buildings in other Departments.

Mr. KEAN. I should like to ask what compensation this chief clerk receives at the present time?

Mr. WARREN. The present pay is $1,600.

Mr. KEAN. Does that correspond with the pay of a chief clerk in the other bureaus?

Mr. WARREN. It does not. It is lower than in some other bureaus, and will be lower after the amount is raised.

I wish to say in this connection that the 220-odd clerks provided for in the Army appropriation bill receive, on an average, about $120 a year each less than the average of those in any other bureau of the War Department.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Office of the Chief of Staff," on page 3, after line 8, to insert:

Contingent expenses at military posts: For the official entertainment of foreign military and naval representatives and other distinguished guests while visiting officially the military posts of the United States Army, to be expended by the Chief of Staff of the Army under the direction of the Secretary of War, $5,000.

Mr. KEAN. I should like to ask the Senator from Wyoming if that item has ever been in the Army appropriation bill before?

Mr. WARREN. There have been various appropriations made, usually larger than this one and usually for special cases, but it has come to this: That there is no year that some time during the year at some place, usually at some of the large posts, and especially the posts on the coast, such posts or forts are visited by officers of the navy and army and the public officials of other countries and officially representing such foreign governments. It merely amounts to the question whether we will ask the lieutenants and captains, or other officers, to entertain those foreign representatives out of their own pockets, or whether the Government shall provide the necessary funds for official entertainment in such instances as those mentioned when the officers are commanded to take care of foreign visitors.

It is only a matter of $5,000. If the Senator has any objection to it I will let it go out.

Mr. KEAN. I have no objection to it, but I would like to have a little explanation. We are increasing the pay of the Army, but I do not want to increase appropriations as to everything connected with the Army.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, I hope no Senator will object to the amendment. During the Jamestown Exposition it is a fact that at Fortress Monroe a number of young officers asked to be sent to other posts in order to relieve them of the additional expense they were put to in entertaining foreign officers who came ashore. It is an injustice to ask first and second lieutenants out of their meager pay to entertain foreign visitors who come ashore and who expect this great Government of ours to at least show them some little attention. These officers have had to do it out of their own pay.

Mr. BACON. I wish to ask the Senator from Wyoming if I am correct in understanding that this applies to West Point also. Does it include West Point?

Mr. WARREN. No; it does not apply there, because there is a specific sum appropriated in the Military Academy appropriation bill which takes care of that feature.

Mr. BACON. I desired to say something on that subject if it did.

Mr. WARREN. That is contained in another bill.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, I take advantage of the opportunity, as the reading of the bill has ceased for a moment, to say that I understand the report accompanying the bill, Report No. 464, has not yet been printed, and we have not had an opportunity of examining the changes which have been made. I should be glad if the Senator in charge of the bill would make a brief statement of the changes that have been made in the bill as passed by the House and to state the aggregate increase in the amount, if any increase has been made, in view of the fact that the report is not here, and we have had no opportunity to examine it.

Mr. WARREN. I have the report here, and it may be read from the desk if the Senator wishes.

Mr. CULBERSON. If the Senator prefers to have it read rather than to make a brief statement, that course is agreeable to me.

Mr. WARREN. I will make a brief statement first, and then if the Senator desires it the report may be read. Printed reports are on the way from the Public Printer, and will be distributed to all the Senators in a few moments. However, I will say the estimates originally made and those made later for this bill amount to $103,206,065.11.

The bill as presented to the Senate by the Military Committee calls for $98,820,409.12. When the bill was reported from the Military Committee of the House of Representatives to the House floor it called for $85,007,566.56. To that there was added on the floor of the House $25,000, carrying it up to $85,032,566.56. From that there was deducted on the House floor, on account of points of order made, the following sums:

Construction and repair of hospitals	$225,000
Shooting galleries and ranges	250,000
Buildings for Engineer School	350,000
Total	825,000

This, deducted from the above total, left the bill as it came to the committee of the Senate from the House, carrying $84,207,566.56. This sum total did not cover the proposed raise of the enlisted men, which in another part of their bill was provided for by the House, nor did it entirely cover the regular estimate for the pay of the Army as it would stand without any raise of pay. It did not provide for the $1,000,000 estimated for maneuvers of the militia of the different States, which we have added.

Now, if the Senator would like to have me make the full statement, there has been added——

Mr. CULBERSON. I do not care to have the report read, but I will ask the Senator a question. If I follow him correctly, the bill does increase the bill as passed by the House by something like $10,000,000.

Mr. WARREN. It increases it $14,000,000—in fact, over $14,000,000.

Mr. CULBERSON. What is the increase by the Senate committee over the appropriation in the Army bill of last year?

Mr. WARREN. I will tell the Senator in a moment. The regular Army appropriation bill of last year carried $78,535,282.75. There was a deficiency, and we have already passed during the present session in the two urgent deficiency bills nearly $4,000,000. There may be yet other deficiencies to cover between now and July 1.

The desire of the committee in making up this bill has been to make the amounts large enough so that there may be no reasonable excuse for deficiencies in the next year, unless caused by subsequent legislation or by unforeseen happenings.

Mr. CULBERSON rose.

Mr. WARREN. One word further, if the Senator will permit me.

Mr. CULBERSON. Certainly.

Mr. WARREN. The bill last year, as it passed Congress, did not comprehend in full the additions made necessary by the passage of the law which increased the Coast Artillery. When the deficiency bill of last year followed, quite a large amount—I do not have it at hand—was added. And thus, as I said before, nearly $4,000,000 has been necessary on the urgent deficiency bills of this year.

Mr. CULBERSON. I wish to make one other inquiry of the Senator from Wyoming.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wyoming yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. WARREN. Certainly; but I will ask that the statement I have in my hand be incorporated in the RECORD, so that it may be before all Senators in the morning. The report, however, is on the way here from the Printing Office, and it will be in the hands of Senators very soon.

The statement referred to is as follows:

Mr. CULBERSON. I notice on page 3, the matter now before the Senate, an appropriation of $5,000 "for the official entertainment of foreign military and naval representatives and other distinguished guests while visiting officially the military posts of the United States Army, to be expended by the Chief of Staff of the Army under the direction of the Secretary of War."

It seems from the Senator's statement in answer to the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] that there is also an appropriation for official entertainment at West Point. I would be glad if the Senator would state what is the aggregate amount that it is proposed to appropriate this year for this character of social entertainment.

Mr. WARREN. I have not the amount at hand, but it is very likely $1,000 to $2,000 for West Point. I will inform the Senator before we finish the consideration of the bill.

Mr. CULBERSON. The amount carried in this bill is $5,000, and it is not for West Point; but one thousand or two thousand dollars is the extent of the appropriation for that purpose?

Mr. WARREN. Just so. The amount for West Point last year was $2,000.

Mr. GORE. I should like to ask the Senator from Wyoming a question.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wyoming yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. WARREN. Certainly.

Mr. GORE. I am a new member, and I wish to inquire whether if a member of the Senate or House should entertain a member of the British Parliament or a member of the German Reichstag, the bill would be paid by the General Government? The payment of such a bill by the Government would seem to be exactly in line with this proposition.

I should like to know further whether these foreign officials are invited or uninvited guests of our Army officers?

Mr. WARREN. I will not be able to inform the Senate what Senators would do on an occasion of that kind, but I will say that this appropriation is intended merely to cover such official visits as may be made by the representatives of foreign governments, their armies, or executive departments, who will visit our posts. I do not suppose there is a government on earth—if so, I do not know of it—that does not provide for the entertainment of such officers as may be detailed by this country to go and visit the maneuvers that are held in such foreign countries. We do not ask and we do not expect to entertain them as royally as ours have been entertained.

So far as the appropriation of $5,000 is concerned, the chairman of the committee is not going to spend any more time on it, and he is perfectly willing to strike it out if the Senate desires it, but I would consider it an outrage if we should strike it out, because if an officer happens to be doing his duty at some point where the representative of a foreign army or navy makes a visit he ought not to be asked to represent this Government and pay the bills of the Government out of his own slender means.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I am not in favor of any reckless expenditure of public money. At the same time I think that this can not properly be so classed. I think it is a very proper expenditure.

I asked the Senator from Wyoming if this would cover the expenditures that have to be made at West Point. He replied in the negative. The reason why I asked him that question was that as a member of the board of visitors, twice I have had occasion to look into the question of the great burden upon the officers of that post imposed by the necessity of entertaining the official representatives of foreign governments who come there to visit and inspect our great Military Academy.

I trust the Senator from Wyoming will not indicate a readiness to strike out the appropriation. I think it is a proper appropriation and that it should be insisted upon.

I speak, Mr. President, with some degree of knowledge as to West Point. I do not know about the other posts because I have not visited them. I have no doubt that in a less degree what is true of West Point is true of the other military posts. But as to West Point the propriety of it, it seems to me, could not be questioned for a moment. We have there the Military Academy for the instruction of young officers to be the officers of the Army. It is the place where military instruction is given, and naturally all the civilized governments of the earth are interested in the question as to what is the method of instruction there and what are the material results which are secured.

Consequently, whenever they send their military representatives to this country one of the points inevitably and certainly visited is West Point. They go there and the only persons to receive them are the officers who are there, the superintendents, the professors, and the instructors. There are some seventy or eighty officers who are detailed there for the purpose of instructing the young cadets who are afterwards to become the officers of the Army.

Here comes the representative of a foreign government. He must be received with some degree of consideration. He must be entertained. There is no place to entertain him except at the homes of these officers, in the private houses of the officers. I say private houses. Of course they are Government buildings, but they are occupied by the officers as private houses, in which they pay their own expenses, where they pay for every article of food or refreshment. When the representatives of foreign governments come there they must be properly entertained, and the officers thus entertain them, and have thus entertained them, regardless of whether or not it is a burden upon them.

But it is something which the Government should bear and which these officers should not bear out of their private meager incomes. Therefore I am very greatly impressed by the fact that it is important.

Now, in response to the suggestion of the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE], I will say this does not apply to every representative of an army of another government who comes visiting this country. It relates merely to those who are here as the official representatives of such a government and who are upon official business. Therefore I am quite sure that my friend from Oklahoma, with that suggestion, will see the difference between the obligation which rests upon the representatives of the Government at that post and those official representatives, and what it would be for a member of the Senate or of the House of Representatives to entertain a visiting member of the British Parliament.

Mr. President, I would have reserved what I have said in regard to West Point until that paricular measure was before the Senate, but the fact that it has become the subject of comment in connection with the specific appropriation in this particular bill made it proper, I thought, that the suggestions which had been made in regard thereto should be replied to at once, and the reply not postponed until that time.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Military Affairs was under the subhead "Office of the Chief Signal Officer," on page 5, line 22, after the word "dollars," to insert the following proviso:

Provided, That the conveyance by Tillie McChesney to the United States of a lot in the town of Fairbanks, Territory of Alaska, donated by said town as a site for a telegraph office and quarters for a detachment of the Signal Corps of the Army, which conveyance was by deed duly executed, acknowledged, and recorded in volume 2 of deeds, Fairbanks precinct, Alaska, is hereby accepted.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 6, after line 3, to insert:

For the increase of post telephone systems at interior posts, $35,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 6, after line 5, to insert:

For the installation of post telephone systems at all garrisoned coast artillery posts, except those located in districts where post telephone systems have already been installed or are in course of installation, $35,000.

Mr. CLAY. With the permission of the Senator from Wyoming, I wish to ask him are not those items on page 6, from line 4 to line 9, inclusive, duplications? I see the first says:

For the increase of post telephone systems at interior posts, $35,000.

The next clause reads:

For the installation of post telephone systems at all garrisoned coast artillery posts, except those located in districts where post telephone systems have already been installed or are in course of installation, $35,000.

Both those items seem to have reference to the installation of telephone systems where they are not now located. It would appear that they would probably have reference to the same thing.

Mr. WARREN. One of these provisions provides for the interior posts for the mobile Army; the other is for the coast artillery, which is handled in an entirely different way. The handling of the big guns, ordnance, and everything in the artillery is through telephonic communication, while in the field with the mobile Army or at interior posts it is of an entirely different nature. The provisions to which the Senator from Georgia refers are not repetitions. It is that much appropriated for each branch. I will say to the Senator that the sum is only a little over half what the estimate called for, but the committee felt that this was as far as we ought to go this year.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Military Affairs was, on page 6, line 14, after the word "until," to strike out "the close of the fiscal year 1910" and insert "expended," so as to make the clause read:

Washington-Alaska military cable and telegraph system: For defraying the cost of such extensions and betterments of the Washington-Alaska military cable and telegraph system as may be approved by the Secretary of War, to be available until expended, from the receipts of the Washington-Alaska military cable and telegraph system that have been covered into the Treasury of the United States, the extent of such extensions and the cost thereof to be reported to Congress by the Secretary of War, $200,000.

Mr. CULBERSON. I ask the Senator from Wyoming how long it is estimated that this appropriation may be extended? Under the Constitution I doubt whether it can go over a period of two years.

Mr. WARREN. What is the Senator's question?

Mr. CULBERSON. Under the Constitution an appropriation for a military purpose can not extend beyond two years. I see that the limitation "the close of the fiscal year 1910" is stricken out, and the word "expended" inserted. So that it reads "to be available until expended," etc.

Mr. WARREN. I will say to the Senator——

Mr. CULBERSON. Of course, if it is estimated that it will be done within two years I have no objection; but I simply call the Senator's attention to it, so that the explanation may go along with this unusual provision in our Army bill.

Mr. WARREN. Conditions are somewhat unusual in Alaska. The seasons are short. If they have, for instance, until the end of the fiscal year, the 1st of July, it is really the beginning of the season there; and it was felt that it was necessary to give them two full seasons.

I will say to the Senator in regard to that appropriation that the largest part of the money comes back into the Treasury in the earnings for business outside of the regular Army business. Heretofore we have on some occasions appropriated the earnings, but it was thought better that they should go into the Treasury; that then the expense should be estimated for and appropriated for regularly. The idea of striking out "the close of the fiscal year 1910" was to give them two full seasons or more.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, in order that the matter may go into the RECORD, I call the Senator's attention to the fact that the Constitution provides:

> Congress shall have power to raise and support armies; but no appropriations of money to that use shall be for a longer term than two years.

It is not quite clear to me that this comes within that provision of the Constitution; but this is an Army appropriation bill. I only invited attention to it in order to say that, if it is estimated even that this expenditure will not extend beyond two years, let it go; but we ought not to permit the idea to go into the Army appropriation bill that we can appropriate money for a longer term than that provided by the Constitution.

Mr. WARREN. If the Senator from Texas objects to the language, as this bill does not go into force until the 1st of July, we could change it and make it to the end of 1910; it is intended to expend all of the appropriation within the two seasons.

I will also say to the Senator that while the amounts of money appropriated for the Army, like funds for pay, do not go back into the Treasury for two or three years, at the same time, when the 1st of July comes what is unexpended at that time must finally go back into the Treasury unless otherwise provided, and the money that is retained beyond that is only to pay for such contracts as were made and for work done prior to the commencement of the following fiscal year. I think the Senator will be perfectly safe in leaving the language stand as it is.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. KEAN. Has that amendment been agreed to, Mr. President?

Mr. BACON. I should like to make an inquiry of the Senator from Wyoming before this amendment is passed. The words proposed to be stricken out read "the close of the fiscal year 1910." That is the amendment, the part stricken out. When does the Senator understand the fiscal year 1910 expires?

Mr. WARREN. I should have said "1911," because it is for the fiscal year 1909 that we are appropriating; and so we should include the years 1909 and 1910, at least. I see here it reads "the close of the fiscal year 1910." That covers it.

Mr. BACON. It reads "the close of the fiscal year 1910."

Mr. WARREN. Yes; I do not care——

Mr. BACON. It is a very small matter, except that possibly there is no provision in the Constitution which is more explicit and guarded than that which relates to the appropriation of money for the Army; and while this is a small matter, I think we ought to be scrupulous in the observance of the requirement.

Mr. WARREN. I have no objection to restoring the House language if the Senator wishes it.

Mr. CULBERSON. I ask the Senator from Wyoming if he will not accept an amendment to strike out the words "until expended" and to insert "for two years," so as to make the appropriation available for two years?

Mr. WARREN. That would be exactly the same in effect, because the bill goes into force on the 1st of July.

Mr. CULBERSON. Very well.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment in lines 14 and 15, on page 6, will be disagreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Military Affairs was, under the subhead "Pay of officers of the line," on page 7, line 3, to increase the appropriation for pay of officers of the line, from $5,556,200 to $5,724,700.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WARREN. Now, Mr. President, I desire to say that it seems that the other House expects that we shall provide for the increase of pay of the Army. Therefore, they not only did not provide an appropriation to cover the item of the extra pay for enlisted men which they inserted, but they did not appropriate up to the estimates that were made for the Army under the old pay schedules. What we have done is, first, to raise the pay of officers and enlisted men to the estimate as it had been made for the Army under the old schedule, then we sent to the War Department and ascertained how much, if anything, less than that old first estimate we could expect they would expend under old schedule; then we have taken the sum total of the proposed raise and reduced it. So that we have in the bill the estimates before any increase in the pay of the Army shall occur, plus a lump sum of $7,000,000; this to be divided under the law, so that every one of these items will have added to it such part of the $7,000,000 as belongs to it.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Military Affairs was under the subhead "Pay of enlisted men," on page 7, line 10, to increase the appropriation for pay of enlisted men of all grades, including recruits, from $10,000,000 to $10,907,078.25.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 7, after line 13, to strike out:

> That hereafter the monthly pay of enlisted men of the Army during their first enlistment shall be as follows, namely: Master electricians, master signal electricians, $75; engineers, $65; regimental sergeants-major, regimental quartermaster-sergeants, regimental commissary-sergeants, sergeants-major, sergeants, senior grade, Coast Artillery, battalion sergeants-major of engineers, post quartermaster-sergeants, post commissary-sergeants, post ordnance-sergeants, battalion quartermaster-sergeants of engineers, sergeants, first class, Hospital Corps, electrician-sergeants, first class, sergeants, first class, Signal Corps, and first sergeants, $45; battalion sergeants-major of infantry and field artillery, squadron sergeants-major, sergeants-major, junior grade, Coast Artillery, battalion, quartermaster-sergeants, field artillery, and master gunners, $40; electrician-sergeants, second class, sergeants of engineers, ordnance, and Signal Corps, quartermaster-sergeants of engineers, and color-sergeants, $36; sergeants and quartermaster-sergeants of cavalry, artillery, and infantry, sergeants of the Hospital Corps, firemen, and cooks, $30: Provided, That mess sergeants shall receive $6 per month in addition to their pay; corporals of engineers, ordnance, Signal Corps, and Hospital Corps, chief mechanics, and mechanics Coast Artillery, $24; corporals of cavalry, artillery, and infantry, mechanics of field artillery, blacksmiths and farriers, saddlers, wagoners, and artificers, $21; privates, first class, of engineers, ordnance, Signal Corps, and Hospital Corps, $18; privates, Hospital Corps, $16; trumpeters, musicians of infantry, artillery, and engineers, privates of cavalry, artillery, infantry, Signal Corps, and privates, second class, engineers and ordnance, $15.

> That nothing in this act shall be construed to increase the pay of enlisted men now on the retired list.
> That sections 1280, 1281, and 1284 of the Revised Statutes be, and are hereby, repealed, and so much of section 4819 as pertains to the deduction of 12½ cents per month from the pay of every soldier of the Regular Army for the benefit of the Soldiers' Home be, and the same is hereby, repealed.
> That section 6 of the act entitled "An act for the better organization of the line of the Army of the United States," approved April 26, 1898, be amended so as to read as follows:
>

And to insert:

That the pay of officers of the Army is hereby, and shall hereafter be, increased as follows:

Mr. KEAN. I want to call the attention of the Senator from Wyoming to the fact that on page 12, line 3, before the word "pay," I think there should be an amendment.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, on page 12, line 3, after the word "the," I move to amend the amendment by inserting the word "present."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 12, line 3, before the word "pay," it is proposed to amend the amendment by inserting the word "present," so as to read:

That the present pay of officers of the Army is hereby, and shall hereafter be, increased as follows, etc.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the amendment was resumed and continued down to line 2, on page 15, as follows:

Of lieutenant-generals, 5 per cent; of major-generals, 10 per cent; of brigadier-generals, 15 per cent; of colonels, lieutenant-colonels, and majors, 20 per cent; of captains, first lieutenants, and second lieutenants, 25 per cent; and the pay of cadets at the Military Academy is hereby, and shall hereafter be, increased 25 per cent: Provided, That section 1267 of the Revised Statutes of the United States is hereby repealed: Provided further, That nothing in this section is intended to increase or change or shall be construed as increasing or changing the present pay or allowances of any officer in the United States Navy; and section 13 of an act entitled "An act to reorganize and increase the efficiency of the personnel of the Navy and Marine Corps of the United States," approved March 3, 1899, shall not be construed as changing the pay of any naval officer by reason of the provisions of this act.

That hereafter, immediately upon official notification of the death from wounds or disease contracted in line of duty of any officer or enlisted man on the active list of the Army, the Paymaster-General of the Army shall cause to be paid to the widow of such officer or enlisted man, or to any other person previously designated by him, an amount equal to six months' pay at the rate received by such officer or enlisted man at the date of his death, less $75 in the case of an officer and $35 in the case of an enlisted man. From the amount thus reserved the Quartermaster's Department shall be reimbursed for expenses of interment, and the residue, if any, of the amount reserved shall be paid subsequently to the designated person. The Secretary of War shall establish regulations requiring each officer and enlisted man to designate the proper person to whom this amount shall be paid in case of his death, and said amount shall be paid to that person from funds appropriated for the pay of the Army.

That hereafter the monthly pay of enlisted men of the Army during their first enlistment shall be as follows, namely: Master electricians, master signal electricians, $75; engineers, $65; sergeants first class Hospital Corps, $50; regimental sergeants-major, regimental quartermaster-sergeants, regimental commissary-sergeants, sergeant-major senior grade Coast Artillery, battalion sergeants-major of engineers, post quartermaster-sergeants, post commissary-sergeants, post ordnance-sergeants, battalion quartermaster-sergeants of engineers, electrician-sergeants first class, sergeants first class Signal Corps, and first sergeants, $45; battalion sergeants-major of infantry and field artillery, squadron sergeants-major junior grade Coast Artillery, battalion quartermaster-sergeants, field artillery, and master gunners, $40; electrician-sergeants second class, sergeants of engineers, ordnance, and Signal Corps, quartermaster-sergeants of engineers, and color-sergeants, $36; sergeants and quartermaster-sergeants of cavalry, artillery, and infantry, stable-sergeants, sergeants, and acting cooks of the Hospital Corps, firemen, and cooks, $30: Provided, That mess sergeants shall receive $6 per month in addition to their pay; corporals of engineers, ordnance, Signal Corps, and Hospital Corps, chief mechanics, and mechanics, Coast Artillery, $24; corporals of cavalry, artillery, and infantry, mechanics of field artillery, blacksmiths and farriers, saddlers, wagoners, and artificers, $21: Provided, That not to exceed one blacksmith and farrier in each troop of cavalry and one mechanic in each battery of field artillery, while actually performing the duty of horseshoer, shall receive $9 per month each in addition to his pay; privates first class of engineers, ordnance, Signal Corps, and Hospital Corps, $18; privates, Hospital Corps, $16; trumpeters, musicians of infantry, artillery, and engineers, privates of cavalry, artillery, infantry, Signal Corps, and private second class, engineers and ordnance, $15.

Mr. McLAURIN. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator from Wyoming, in charge of the bill, a question. The amendment provides that "trumpeters, musicians of infantry, artillery, and engineers, privates of cavalry, artillery, infantry, Signal Corps, and privates second class, engineers and ordnance," shall receive $15 per month. What is their pay now?

Mr. WARREN. I will turn to the pay schedules.

Mr. McLAURIN. I see it is increased to $15 by this bill. What I desire to know is——

Mr. WARREN. Where the sum $15 applies to privates, it is a raise from $13 on the first enlistment.

Mr. McLAURIN. Then if it were a 40 per cent increase it would be a raise from $10.71 to $15. What per cent is the increase in the pay of this class of enlisted men of the Army?

Mr. WARREN. I want to say to the Senator that the committee took up the instructions of the Senate to provide as near as may be a 40 per cent average increase in the pay of the enlisted men and noncommissioned officers; but it was thought best to distribute it all the way from zero to 100 per cent, for reasons which are given. Last year we provided for an increase in the pay of certain noncommissioned officers of the Army, electricians, and so forth, holding positions that we were totally unable to fill under the old classification in the artillery. We raised those salaries to such a point as has enabled us to enlist good men for those positions and as high as we thought they ought to be. To that class we have added nothing in this bill. As to other classes, for instance, the privates, instead of adding 40 per cent to the first enlistment, we have added 15.3 per cent by increasing the pay from $13 to $15. In their second enlistment we give them $18; which is a fraction less than 40 per cent increase.

In their third enlistment we give them $3 more, which carries them away above 40 per cent. So they finally get in the seventh, eighth, and ninth enlistments about double, instead of 40 per cent. It was thought best in conducting enlistments in the Army to put some premium up that will cause men that are acceptable to the Department to reenlist. Therefore, instead of applying the increase of 40 per cent all the way through, we have applied it as to renewed enlistments more largely than to the first.

Mr. McLAURIN. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question there in reference to men who are acceptable to the Department? Are there any men who are honorably discharged who are precluded from reenlisting?

Mr. WARREN. Not at all. If they can pass the physical examination and are honorably discharged, of course they can reenlist.

Mr. McLAURIN. No man can reenlist unless he can pass the physical examination?

Mr. WARREN. Of course not.

Mr. McLAURIN. Mr. President, when the bill was up some days ago in reference to the pay of the Army, I was not satisfied with that bill, because I did not think that there ought to be a provision averaging the per cent of increase of enlisted men; but I thought that every enlisted man's pay ought to be increased at least 40 per cent.

Mr. WARREN. Will the Senator yield to me there for a moment?

Mr. McLAURIN. With pleasure.

Mr. WARREN. The proposed pay for privates runs as follows: For the first year, $15—that is, for the first enlistment of three years——

Mr. McLAURIN. And that is an increase of what per cent?

Mr. WARREN. Between 15 and 16 per cent. At the end of the first enlistment, when a soldier enlists the second time, he gets $18; which is an increase of about 40 per cent, or a fraction less than 40 per cent. When he enlists the third time he gets $21; when he enlists the fourth time he gets $22; the fifth time, $23; the sixth time, $24; and the seventh time, $25; which is nearly double.

Mr. McLAURIN. Mr. President, the thing that troubles me is that a soldier may not reenlist the second time or the third time. I think while the pay of the Army is being increased through all the grades of the service that the enlisted man's pay ought to be increased at least 40 per cent. It is proposed to increase the pay of lieutenant-colonels 5 per cent, of major-generals 10 per cent, of colonels, lieutenant-colonels, and majors 20 per cent, and of captains, first and second lieutenants 25 per cent. Then there is an increase for certain noncommissioned officers; but there is not an adequate increase, in my judgment, of the pay of the enlisted man, the man who is at the foot of a class; in other words, the man who does really the work that is done in the Army, the man who stands sentinel in the rain and sleet and snow or in the heat, the man who goes out and does the drudgery of the work does not get that kind of increase that I think he ought to have in proportion to the others.

I am not going to offer any further amendment. I made some trouble about this when the bill was before the Senate on a previous day.

Mr. BACON. I thought the Senator from Mississippi had then fully made his status known to the country and that nothing further was required of him.

Mr. McLAURIN. Yes; but it is to the Senate I am trying to make my status known. I am trying to get the Senate to do right. I am not trying to make my status known to the country. I am not so much interested in that as I am in getting the Senate to do right.

Mr. BACON. I am quite sure of that, Mr. President.

Mr. McLAURIN. Yes; and I am glad to hear the Senator say that, because I know he would not say it if it were not in his heart to do so.

Mr. SCOTT. Will the Senator from Mississippi permit me to interrupt him a moment?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from West Virginia?

Mr. McLAURIN. Certainly; with pleasure.

Mr. SCOTT. I know the Senator from Mississippi wants to see this bill made as nearly perfect as possible. The idea of the committee in providing for the increase as it is in the bill was that a man who remains in the Army for a second enlistment and a third enlistment is worth more to the Government than when he serves his first enlistment. He may enlist the first time, as it were, as an experiment, so as to see something of the world, with the intention of only remaining three years in the service and then going back to the farm. But to the young man who enlists with the intention of making the Army his life occupation, we want to offer an inducement for him to remain in the Army, and consequently we have proposed to divide up this increase in that way.

Mr. McLAURIN. Mr. President, that does not appeal to me. I do not think that we ought to have such a big Army anyhow. My idea about it is that an Army of 10,000 men is sufficient in this country in time of peace, and I believe that we ought not to have such a large Army as we have. If, however, we are going to have an Army of sixty or one hundred thousand men and we want to get men to remain in the Army, we must first induce them to go into the Army. You can not get men to remain in the Army unless you first get them to go in. They can not remain unless they first join the Army, and it is the men who join the Army in good faith—not, as the Senator from West Virginia says, as an experiment, because the class of people in this country who join the Army do not join it as an experiment—but if they do stay in the Army during one enlistment and go back to the farm, they ought to have something to take back for their service, and they ought not to be discriminated against.

Mr. CLAY. Mr. President, I want to ask the Senator is it not true that while in this bill—I have run through it only hurriedly—we have provided for an average increase in pay of 40 per cent, there have been increases made in the schedule fixed by the committee in some instances, such as in the case of electricians, and so forth, really ranging from 40 to 100 per cent? Is it not also true that the enlisted men, the privates, instead of getting an increase of 40 per cent, receive an increase of only about 15 per cent?

If I understand this bill—and as I have said, I have been able to go through it only hurriedly, the bill only having been reported to-day and I have just gotten hold of the list giving the amounts drawn by the different officers of the Army at this time—I see there are instances here where there has been an increase, not only of 40 per cent, but even of 80 per cent, if I understand it, and in many instances the increases have not gone any higher than 14 and 15 per cent.

Mr. WARREN. And in some cases there has been no increase at all.

Mr. CLAY. And in some cases there has been no increase at all, as the Senator says. That is correct. At this time the private soldier receives $13 per month. By this bill you give him $15 per month, which is an increase of between 15 and 16 per cent. If you had given the private soldier an increase of 30 or 40 per cent—you could not have gone any higher than 40 per cent—that would have been an increase up to nearly $19 per month.

Mr. McLAURIN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. CLAY. With pleasure.

Mr. McLAURIN. Why could not the Military Committee give the private soldier more than 40 per cent increase?

Mr. CLAY. I do not say that they could not have done it under that bill, because it provided for an average. That bill provided for a general average, but I am not able to see the justice of these schedules. So far as I have gone, it appears that certain enlisted men of the Army—electricians, engineers, etc.—are given an increase of from 60 to 80 and even up to 100 per cent, but the private soldiers only secure an increase of 15 or 16 per cent.

Mr. WARREN. Now, Mr. President, I know the Senator does not want to make a misstatement.

Mr. CLAY. I do not.

Mr. WARREN. The enlisted men receive as a class the highest consideration of any class in this bill, when you take the course through, if they reenlist and stay, as the officers of the Army have to do to get large pay.

Mr. CLAY. I contend that when a private soldier enters the Army and stays four years at $13 or $15 per month he is not securing enough from the Government for hardly a bare existence. I most cheerfully gave my support and voted in favor of an increase, because I believe that the increase ought to be made. I do not believe that $18 per month is too much money for a private soldier. It is a hard life, and we have a great deal of trouble in getting private soldiers in the Army and securing new enlistments. The Senator himself says that there have been many increases that have gone even to 100 per cent, and in some instances there have been no increases at all. I have not had the time to critically examine the bill; I have only had an opportunity to examine it hurriedly during the last few moments.

Mr. WARREN. If the Senator had paid closer attention to what I said about it, I think he would have received some information from that. Now, those whose salaries have not been raised are those whose pay was raised in a prior bill to the extent, perhaps, of 30 per cent or 40 per cent or even 60 per cent.

Mr. CLAY. That is a good reason for not raising those.

Mr. WARREN. That is one reason. When it comes to the private soldier, he has everything furnished to him free, even to his toothbrush. When he goes into the Army he has not a cent to spend for anything except for paper and postage stamps. When he goes in the first year he has to learn the business. If the Senator wanted help on his farm or in his office or any other place he would not pay a green boy as much the first month or the first six months as he would after he had been there three years.

Mr. CLAY. I will venture the assertion that the Senator could not hire a first-class man to work on a farm in Wyoming for $13 per month.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, we have plenty of enlistments in Wyoming of men who accept $13 and go into the Army. But this is the problem. The man who goes into the Army for the first time is of very little use to the Army. He has to learn the business. Usually desertions occur during that period. The hoboes, who sometimes get in, are no good anywhere. Those who are to remain know that if they reenlist at the end of their first enlistment, they can get this extra compensation, which, even in the second enlistment, amounts to 40 per cent, less a mere fraction, and he receives more on subsequent reenlistments, and in the sixth or seventh enlistment goes up as high as almost 100 per cent. Those who enlist in the Army as privates, if they remain and reenlist, usually become noncommissioned officers after a short while and consequently get still more pay. Even if they remain long enough as privates, they receive nearly 100 per cent over what they get during their first enlistment.

The pay of noncommissioned officers has not been raised higher in proportion than that of the privates. The 100 per cent applies, for instance, to only two or three places—privates in the bands. Men educated in music have been receiving only $13 a month. The consequence is that we have scarcely a band in the United States that has anywhere near its full complement. It is impossible to enlist musicians at $13 per month.

Mr. CLAY. Does the Senator hope to get this bill through to-night?

Mr. WARREN. This bill is in the hands of the Senate. The chairman of the committee has no desire only to have the business of the Senate done as rapidly as may be pleasant to the Senate.

Mr. CLAY. I will say to the Senator that I would be glad if he would pass this item over and go on to the next item, so as to give me a few moments to examine it.

Mr. WARREN. Certainly; that is all right. I ask that this amendment be passed over and that the next amendment may be stated.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I should like to ask the Senator from Wyoming if it is his expectation that the increase in pay provided for in this bill will promote enlistments in the Army?

Mr. WARREN. I think there is no doubt about it.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. It is necessary that a higher pay should be given to bring about that result?

Mr. WARREN. I think so.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Is it not necessary to offer some additional inducements in order to provide for enlistments and reenlistments?

Mr. WARREN. I think so, and I believe that we are offering inducements in this bill that will not only provide for enlisting men to fill up the ranks, but that will encourage men to make the Army a profession or business, because the pay provided for reenlistments and the opportunities afforded to become noncommissioned officers will help to satisfy a large class of these men, so that we may have an Army of veterans, of well-educated, of well-disposed, sober, and upright men.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment will be passed over.

The reading of the amendment of the Committee on Military Affairs was resumed and continued, as follows:

That hereafter any soldier honorably discharged at the termination of an enlistment period who reenlists within three months thereafter shall be entitled to continuous-service pay as herein provided, which shall be in addition to the initial pay provided for in this act and shall be as follows, namely: For those whose initial pay as provided herein is $36 or more an increase of $4 monthly pay for and during the second enlistment, and a further increase of $4 for and during each subsequent enlistment up to and including the seventh, after which the pay shall remain as in the seventh enlistment. For those whose initial pay as provided for herein is $18, $21, $24, or $30, an increase of $3 monthly pay for and during the second enlistment, and a further increase of $3 for and during each subsequent enlistment up to and including the seventh, after which the pay shall remain as in the seventh enlistment. For those whose initial pay as provided for herein is $15 and $16, an increase of $3 monthly pay for and during the second and third enlistments each, and a further increase of $1 for and during each subsequent enlistment up to and including the seventh, after which the pay shall remain as in the seventh enlistment: Provided, That hereafter any soldier honorably discharged at the termination of his first or any succeeding enlistment period who reenlists after the expiration of three months shall be regarded as in his second enlistment; that an enlistment shall not be regarded as complete until the soldier shall have made good any time lost during an enlistment period by unauthorized absences exceeding one day, but any soldier who receives an honorable discharge for the convenience of the Government after having served more than half of his enlistment shall be considered as having served an enlistment period within the meaning of this act; that the present enlistment period of men now in service shall be determined by the number of years continuous service they have had at the date of approval of this act, under existing laws, counting three years to an enlistment: And provided further, That hereafter any soldier honorably discharged at the termination of an enlistment period who reenlists within three months of the date of said discharge shall, upon such reenlistment, receive an amount equal to three months' pay at the rate he was receiving at the time of his discharge.

That hereafter enlisted men now qualified or hereafter qualifying as marksmen shall receive $2 per month; as sharpshooters, $3 per month; as expert riflemen, $5 per month; as second-class gunners, $2 per month; as first-class gunners, $3 per month; as gun pointers, gun commanders, observers second class, chief planters and chief loaders, $7 per month; as plotters, observers first class, and casemate electricians, $9 per month, all in addition to their pay, but no enlisted man shall receive at the same time additional pay for more than one of the classifications named in this section: Provided, That nothing in this act shall be construed to increase the total number of gun pointers, gun commanders, observers, chief planters, chief loaders, plotters, and casemate electricians now authorized by law.

That increase of pay for service beyond the limits of the States comprising the Union, and the Territories of the United States contiguous thereto, shall be as now provided by law.

That hereafter the monthly pay during the first enlistment of enlisted men of bands, exclusive of the band of the United States Military Academy, shall be as follows:

Chief musicians, $75; principal musicians and chief trumpeters, $40; sergeants and drum majors, $36; corporals, $30; and privates, $24; and the continuous-service pay of all grades shall be as provided in this act: Provided, That Army bands or members thereof shall not receive remuneration for furnishing music outside the limits of military posts when the furnishing of such music places them in competition with local civilian musicians.

That sections 1280, 1281, and 1284 of the Revised Statutes be, and are hereby, repealed, and so much of section 4819 as pertains to the deduction of 12½ cents per month from the pay of every soldier of the Regular Army for the benefit of the Soldiers' Home be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

That section 6 of the act entitled "An act for the better organization of the line of the Army of the United States," approved April 26, 1898, be amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 6. That any soldier who deserts shall, besides incurring the penalties now attaching to the crime of desertion, forfeit all right to pension which he might otherwise have acquired."

That nothing herein contained shall be construed so as to reduce the pay or allowances now authorized by law for any officer or enlisted man of the Army; and all laws or parts of laws inconsistent with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed.

Mr. KEAN. As I understand, the portion of the amendment at the top of page 18 repeals the sections of the Revised Statutes relating to the contribution of soldiers to the Soldiers' Homes. I should like to ask the reason for that.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, it is considered that there is sufficient money to maintain the Homes without these contributions. This arbitrary deduction from the pay of soldiers is considered unnecessary and has been considered unfair.

Mr. KEAN. I do not know whether it was always considered unfair. It may be considered unfair if there is a sufficient fund at the present time; but I should like to ask the Senator whether they have a sufficient fund to maintain the Soldiers' Homes except by direct appropriation from Congress?

Mr. WARREN. The Senate may pass that amendment over, and I will try to get the information for the Senator. It is a House provision. I am quite sure the assessment is not needed.

Mr. KEAN. Very well. May I ask the Senator from Wyoming how this changes existing law?

Mr. WARREN. I do not think it changes it at all, except that it makes it harmonize with the different rates of pay, and so forth. It was reinserted here in this amendment because we cut out the House provision which contained it in another place.

Mr. KEAN. I did not refer to that exactly. That I understand perfectly. I refer to section 6:

SEC. 6. That any soldier who deserts shall, besides incurring the penalties now attaching to the crime of desertion, forfeit all right to pension which he might otherwise have acquired.

How does that change existing law? If the man is a deserter, he can not get a pension.

Mr. WARREN. It does not change it at all. It is a reintroduction, so as to place it in harmonious form. I can look it up for the Senator later.

Mr. KEAN. It is not that I have any objection to it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair desires the attention of the Senator from Wyoming. The amendment reported is one amendment and includes two portions which have been passed over. The Chair suggests that the residue of the amendment be passed over.

Mr. WARREN. It is my intention to ask that the entire amendment be passed over for the present until Senators may become better acquainted with the schedules.

Mr. CLAY. I have been going over it, and I am willing to have it acted on now.

Mr. WARREN. The amendment was laid over at the request of the Senator from Georgia and on the suggestion of the Senator from New Jersey. The Senator from Georgia is willing that the amendment should be adopted. I ask the Senator from New Jersey if he is also willing; and if so, I ask that it may be agreed to.

Mr. KEAN. Very well.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment as amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 21, line 7, to reduce the number of clerks at $1,000 each from 100 to 84.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 22, line 1, to increase the total appropriation for pay to clerks, messengers, and laborers at headquarters of divisions and departments and office of the Chief of Staff from $329,040 to $344,640.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "For pay of officers of the Staff Corps and Staff Departments," on page 23, line 23, to increase the appropriation for pay of officers in the Medical Department from $675,000 to $686,300.

The amendment was agreed to.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 25, under the head "Miscellaneous," line 17, after the word "For," to insert "pay of;" and in the same line, after the word "nurses" to insert "(female)," so as to make the clause read:

For pay of 100 nurses (female), $55,020.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 24, line 24, after the word "For," to insert "pay of," so as to make the clause read:

For pay of thirty-one dental surgeons, $57,960.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 26, line 1, after the word "For," to insert "pay of," so as to make the clause read:

For pay of contract surgeons, $360,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 27, line 13, before the word "dollars," to strike out "eight thousand" and insert "nine thousand two hundred," so as to make the clause read:

For extra pay to enlisted men employed on extra duty as switchboard operators at each interior post of the Army, $9,200.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 27, line 18, before the word "thousand," to strike out "twenty-nine" and insert "thirty-six," so as to make the clause read:

For extra pay to enlisted men of the line of the Army and to enlisted men of the Signal Corps employed in the Territory of Alaska on the Alaskan cable and telegraph system, for periods of not less than ten days, at the rate of 35 cents per day, $36,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 27, line 20, before the word "thousand," to strike out "five hundred and fifty" and insert "six hundred;" and at the end of the paragraph to insert the following additional proviso:

"Provided further, That hereafter when officers of the Army travel in compliance with orders in connection with the procurement, maintenance, or installation of military material, or in connection with the construction of military works, their mileage shall be charged to the appropriations authorizing the purpose with which the travel is connected: Provided, That the amount so expended in any fiscal year shall not exceed $50,000," so as to make the clause read:

For mileage to officers and contract surgeons when authorized by law, $600,000: Provided, That hereafter actual expenses only, not to exceed $4.50 per day and cost of transportation when not furnished by the Quartermaster's Department, shall be paid to the officers of the Army, contract surgeons, and dental surgeons, when traveling on duty without troops, under competent orders, within the geographical limits of the Territory of Alaska: Provided further, That hereafter when officers of the Army travel in compliance with orders in connection with the procurement, maintenance, or installation of military material, or in connection with the construction of military works, their mileage shall be charged to the appropriations authorizing the purposes with which the travel is connected: Provided, That the amount so expended in any fiscal year shall not exceed $50,000.

Mr. BACON. I should like to ask the Senator in charge of the bill whether the proviso is limited to expenses which may be incurred in Alaska. Does it relate to that solely?

Mr. WARREN. The Senator means traveling expenses?

Mr. BACON. Yes. It is meant as a general provision?

Mr. WARREN. It is a general provision wherever any officer is sent to inspect or purchase material.

Mr. BACON. I did not make the inquiry for the purpose of objecting to it, but I have a doubt in my mind as to whether the language is sufficient for that purpose, if it is such as is now stated by the Senator.

Mr. KEAN. I think it is limited to Alaska the way it is drawn.

Mr. BACON. That is the object I had in making the inquiry. If it is designed that it should be a general provision, it seems to me that the language following the particular provision with reference to Alaska should be changed.

Mr. WARREN. It is not the intention to confine it to Alaska, and I do not think it is so confined.

Mr. BACON. That is what I am after.

Mr. LODGE. If the Senator will look at the paragraph he will see that it reads:

For mileage to officers and contract surgeons when authorized by law.

Then comes the proviso relating to Alaska, and then another proviso relating to the general subject.

Mr. BACON. That is a fact. It is a second proviso.

Mr. LODGE. It is a substantive proviso.

Mr. BACON. I was thinking of it as a substantive proposition, but I see an additional proviso to the original proposition.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 28, after line 10, to strike out:

For additional 20 per cent increase to enlisted men on foreign service, $767,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 28, after line 16, to insert:

For additional 20 per cent increase to enlisted men on foreign service, $767,000: Provided, That officers and enlisted men who have served on army transports in the Philippine Archipelago at any time since May 26, 1900, under the control and orders of the commanding general, Philippines Division, or who may hereafter so serve, shall be entitled to receive the same rate of pay as is provided by law for officers and enlisted men serving at shore stations beyond the limits of the United States.

Mr. BACON. I should like to ask the Senator if that amendment is intended to supply what is stricken out in lines 11, 12, and 13?

Mr. WARREN. The first part of it. It is merely a different arrangement. The last part of it is to correct a situation which requires the liberation of funds that are in the hands of paymasters. I will not say it is to legalize, but to accept their returns on money that they have paid out. The Auditor, as a rule, under the language where we appropriated this 20 per cent, held that it applied to shore duty, and if a private soldier got on a transport and served there a month or two he could not receive the 20 per cent additional pay.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Philippine Scouts," on page 31, line 2, after the word "fund," to insert the following proviso:

Provided, That the sum of $7,000,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the purpose of paying to enlisted men the bonus of three months' pay for reenlistments and the increase in pay for officers and enlisted men, including enlisted men of the Hospital Corps, at the rates provided for in this act: And provided further, That the specific appropriations hereinbefore made for the officers and enlisted men in the line of the Army and in the several staff corps and departments, enlisted men in the Hospital Corps, officers and enlisted men in the Porto Rico Provisional Regiment of Infantry, and officers in the Philippine Scouts, being based upon former rates of pay, said specific appropriations are hereby increased to the amounts necessary for payment of such increase of pay at the rates established in this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 31, after line 18, to insert:

Encampment and maneuvers, organized militia: For paying the expenses of the organized militia of any State, Territory, or of the District of Columbia, which may be authorized by the Secretary of War to participate in such encampments as may be established for the field instruction of the troops of the Regular Army, as provided by sections 15 and 21 of the act of January 21, 1903, entitled "An act to promote the efficiency of the militia, and for other purposes," to be immediately available and to remain available until expended, $1,000,000.

Mr. KEAN. I call the attention of the Senator from Wyoming to the words "until expended," in line 3, on page 32.

Mr. WARREN. Of course all of it would be contracted this year, and naturally there would be some settlements to make on what is contracted this year that will run over into another year. If the Senator would like to put a qualifying sentence in there I have no objection. It is not to carry it beyond the next year.

Mr. BACON. I should like to call the attention of the Senator from Wyoming to the fact that while it is scarcely to be anticipated that the power would be abused, the language is a little unfortunate in the mention of the States in the twentieth and twenty-first lines, on page 31. Of course nobody supposes for a moment that the Secretary of War is going to designate the militia of only one State, but it ought not to be expressed as it is. It seems to me it ought to read, "the organized militia of States, Territories, or of the District of Columbia," instead of "any State, Territory, or of the District of Columbia."

Mr. KEAN. It will have to be authorized by the Secretary of War.

Mr. BACON. That is the evident intention of it, and I have no doubt in the world it will be construed by the Department, but it ought to be expressed properly.

Mr. WARREN. I will say to the Senator that some States object to taking part even when invited.

Mr. BACON. I understand that. Every State, of course, will not be included. I am not at all apprehensive that the Secretary of War would pick out one State and vote a million dollars to it. I am simply concerned that we should express ourselves properly. I may be wrong about it, but it seems to me that it ought to be in the plural instead of the singular.

Mr. WARREN. There is no objection to making it plural. I think the language is better as it is, however.

Mr. BACON. I will not insist if the Senator is satisfied with it.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Subsistence Department," on page 35, line 7, to increase the total appropriation for the purchase of subsistence supplies from $7,000,000 to $7,382,951.45.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Quartermaster's Department," on page 35, line 24, after the word "posts," to strike out "and on transports;" and in line 25, after the word "appliances," to strike out "of fuel and lights for enlisted men" and insert "for furnishing heat and light for the authorized allowance of quarters for officers and enlisted men," so as to read:

Regular supplies of the Quartermaster's Department, including their care and protection, consisting of stoves and heating apparatus required for heating offices, hospitals, barracks, and quarters, and recruiting stations, and United States military prisons; also ranges and stoves, and appliances for cooking and serving food at posts, and repair and maintenance of such heating and cooking appliances; for furnishing heat and light for the authorized allowance of quarters for officers and enlisted men, and for recruits, etc.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 37, line 8, to increase the appropriation for the Quartermaster's Department from $9,000,000 to $9,937,156.10.

Mr. BACON. There is an increase of nearly $1,000,000. I have no doubt it is correct, but I think a statement ought to be made as to what is the occasion for the increase over the amount appropriated by the House of nearly $1,000,000 for this purpose. I suppose that there was a sufficient reason given to the committee.

Mr. WARREN. I will say to the Senator that the House evidently wanted to err, if at all, on the economical side, and did not provide sufficiently or what was estimated for, and did not, perhaps, have some of the evidence before its Members that will be found in the hearings before the Senate committee. Then, again, the House did not insert the appropriation of $1,000,000 for the maneuvers of the militia. The expectation is that the militia will be grouped in maneuvers with certain parts of the Regular Army and that will require extra transportation. That of itself would increase the appropriation somewhat.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 40, line 23, to increase the total appropriation for incidental expenses from $2,200,000 to $2,478,237.76.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the appropriation for the purchase of horses for cavalry, artillery, and engineers, on page 41, line 10, after the word "reasonable," to strike out "provisions for remounts" and insert "provision for replacing unserviceable animals," so as to make the proviso read:

Provided, That the number of horses purchased under this appropriation, added to the number now on hand, shall be limited to the actual needs of the mounted service, including reasonable provision for replacing unserviceable animals, etc.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the appropriation for barracks and quarters, on page 42, line 1, after the word "and" to strike out "such heavy permanent furniture for," and in line 3, after the word "and," to insert "the Auditor for the War Department is authorized and directed to remove any suspensions of accounts of quartermasters for the fiscal years 1907 and 1908, for the purchase of furniture where the same has been or may be approved by the Secretary of War," so as to read:

Barracks and quarters: For barracks and quarters for troops, other than Seacoast Artillery, storehouses for the safe-keeping of military stores, for offices, recruiting stations, to provide such furniture for the public rooms of officers' messes and officers' quarters at military posts as may be approved by the Secretary of War, and the Auditor for the War Department is authorized and directed to remove any suspensions of accounts of quartermasters for the fiscal years 1907 and 1908, for the purchase of furniture where the same has been or may be approved by the Secretary of War, etc.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 42, line 24, after the words "Secretary of War," to strike out "$3,027,420: Provided, That of this amount not over $1,000,000 shall be used for new construction and not over $100,000 of that sum at any one post," and insert "$4,500,000: Provided, That no part of the sum herein appropriated shall be used for the construction of officers' quarters at the Army War College," so as to make the proviso read:

Provided further, That the number of and total sum paid for civilian employees in the Quartermaster's Department, including those paid from the funds appropriated for regular supplies, incidental expenses, barracks and quarters, army transportation, clothing, camp and garrison equipage, shall be limited to the actual requirements of the service, and that no employee paid therefrom shall receive a salary of more than $150 per month, except upon the approval of the Secretary of War, $4,500,000: Provided, That no part of the sum herein appropriated shall be used for the construction of officers' quarters at the Army War College.

Mr. KEAN. I think some explanation ought to be made of that provision.

Mr. WARREN. We provided in former bills that out of this sum appropriated the officers' quarters and men's quarters owned by the United States might be provided with heavy furniture, and in some way we used the words, "permanent heavy furniture." The present Auditor for the War Department is, very properly, exceedingly particular. He does not wish to vary from the law and he has construed it to mean such furniture as is built in as a part of the house, while it was intended to cover such things as dining-room tables, hall racks, and so forth.

To go back to the origin of the appropriation, the officers are allowed a certain amount of baggage, we will say 6,000 pounds. An officer who has his house furnished, and he has to furnish it himself, uses 6,000 pounds of baggage going, we will say, to the Philippines, and when that baggage consists of large furniture, like cupboards or desks or dining tables, it costs the Government a great deal more to transport it over there than it does to buy it and install it in all the houses and permit it to remain permanently. So, as a matter of economy, we provided for furnishing this heavy furniture.

That is as to the first amendment. Now, as to the relief of the accounting officers. The Quartermaster-General last year contracted for certain furniture for posts in the Philippines to be delivered on or after July 1, in order to bring it under the new bill. He had a transport leaving a few days earlier, in which there was plenty of room and no freight to fill it, and it would be followed by transports for a number of months that were crowded. He therefore accepted this furniture and shipped it away before July 1, and the Auditor held up his accounts because the furniture was delivered before the bill was applicable. It is to correct that.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The words "has been," I suppose are intended to cover that?

Mr. WARREN. Yes.

Mr. KEAN. If I remember rightly, I think the amendment in regard to heavy furniture was offered by the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. SCOTT] some years ago.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 43, line 11, after the word "gymnasium," to insert "including heat and light for the buildings erected at private cost in the operation of the act approved May 31, 1902;" and in line 17, after the word "expended," to insert "in the construction of buildings," so as to make the clause read:

Military post exchange: For continuing the construction, equipment, and maintenance of suitable buildings at military posts and stations for the conduct of the post exchange school, library, reading, lunch, amusement rooms, and gymnasium, including heat and light for the buildings erected at private cost in the operation of the act approved May 31, 1902, to be expended in the discretion and under the direction of the Secretary of War, $400,000: Provided, That not more than $40,000 of the above appropriation shall be expended in the construction of buildings at any one post or station.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 43, line 22, after the word "baggage," to insert, "including the cost of packing and crating; for the reimbursement of officers traveling under orders between points inaccessible by common carriers for the cost of hire of transportation between such points when it is impracticable for the Quartermaster's Department to furnish owned transportation; for transportation," so as to read:

Transportation of the Army and its supplies: For transportation of the Army and its supplies, including transportation of the troops when moving either by land or water, and of their baggage, including the cost of packing and crating; for the reimbursement of officers traveling under orders between points inaccessible by common carriers for the cost of hire of transportation between such points when it is impracticable for the Quartermaster's Department to furnish owned transportation; for transportation of recruits and recruiting parties, etc.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 44, line 20, after the word "Army," to strike out "for the payment as provided by law of Army transportation due such land-grant railroads as have not received aid in Government bonds, $3,697,561.65" and insert:

For the hire of employees: For the payment of Army transportation lawfully due such land-grant railroads as have not received aid in Government bonds (to be adjusted in accordance with the decisions of the Supreme Court in cases decided under such land-grant acts), but in no case shall more than 50 per cent of full amount of service be paid: Provided, That such compensation shall be computed upon the basis of the tariff or lower special rates for the like transportation performed for the public at large, and shall be accepted as in full for all demands for such service: Provided further, That in expending the money appropriated by this act, a railroad company which has not received aid in bonds of the United States, and which obtained a grant of public land to aid in the construction of its railroad on condition that such railroad should be a post route and military road, subject to the use of the United States for postal, military, naval, and other Government services, and also subject to such regulations as Congress may impose restricting the charge for such Government transportation, having claims against the United States for transportation of troops and munitions of war and military supplies and property over such aided railroads, shall be paid out of the moneys appropriated by the foregoing provision only on the basis of such rate for the transportation of such troops and munitions of war and military supplies and property as the Secretary of War shall deem just and reasonable under the foregoing provision, such rate not to exceed 50 per cent of the compensation for such Government transportation as shall at that time be charged to and paid by private parties to any such company for like and similar transportation; and the amount so fixed to be paid shall be accepted as in full for all demands for such service.

So as to read:

For transportation of funds of the Army; the hire of employees; for the payment of Army transportation lawfully due such land-grant railroads as have not received aid in Government bonds (to be adjusted in accordance with the decisions of the Supreme Court in cases decided under such land-grant acts), but in no case shall more than 50 per cent of full amount of service be paid, etc.

Mr. KEAN. I should like the Senator to explain how that change existing law.

Mr. WARREN. It does not change it at all. It simply reinserts it, because under the construction the Auditor applied last year it was desirable to have it included this year.

Mr. KEAN. It is desirable that it should always apply, because it is a contract, when the Government would have to carry the troops at such a price.

Mr. WARREN. It was considered necessary to reinsert it. During the last year we had it in the bill and it was thought necessary to reintroduce it.

Mr. BACON. It is very difficult to understand the amendment since the sentences are so long and involved. I notice that the House provision carried $3,697,561.65. At the same time there were other items, which are not embraced in the amendment found on page 46, amounting to $2,314,613.75. But the two together will have amounted to something like $6,000,000, whereas the amendment, if I read it correctly, including those same provisions, amounts to over $11,200,000. Am I correct?

Mr. WARREN. No; the $11,000,000 is the whole sum—the original sum of all these added together.

Mr. BACON. I understand. But the original sum, if I read it correctly in the bill as it came from the House——

Mr. WARREN. In the House it was in three divisions. I will explain it to the Senator. Formerly what now comes to us in five provisions was all under the one head of "transportation." We were asked continually why the water furnished the posts, the plumbing in the houses, and all that was charged in transportation. The answer to that is very simple. At the posts established on the frontier or in any new place the water had to be drawn to the place on wagons or by the laying of pipes, so that it became a part of the transportation.

In order to understand it better, we wanted to have it divided. We called on the Department to make a division. They divided it as we wanted they should. The water and the sewerage we have in one amount. They have given us the walks, roads, and so forth in another. Then they went still further and added a division between land transportation, water transportation, rail transportation, and so forth, which we do not deem proper, because it is impossible to tell a year beforehand how much water transportation as against land or how much land as against water may be required. So we grouped those three together.

Mr. BACON. I understand, then, that it includes not only the two sums I have mentioned, but also the $5,000,000 fund at the bottom of page 46.

Mr. WARREN. Yes; it includes all those in one.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 46, line 6, before the word "the," to strike out "For" and insert "for;" in line 8, before the word "reasonable," to strike out the letter "a;" in line 9, before the word "replacing," to strike out "the;" and in the same line, before the word "unserviceable," to strike out "of," so as to read:

for the purchase and hire of draft and pack animals in such numbers as are actually required for the service, including reasonable provision for replacing unserviceable animals.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 46, line 15, after the word "masters," to strike out $2,314,613.75. For" and insert a semicolon and "for;" in line 20, after the word "transports," to insert "and other vessels," so as to read:

For the purchase and repair of such harness, wagons, carts, and drays as are required for the transportation of troops and supplies and for garrison purposes; for drayage and cartage at the several depots; for the hire of teamsters and other employees; and for extra-duty pay of enlisted men driving teams, repairing means of transportation, and employed as trainmasters; for the purchase and repair of ships, boats, and other vessels required for the transportation of troops and supplies and for garrison purposes; for expenses of sailing public transports and other vessels on the various rivers, the Gulf of Mexico, and the Atlantic and Pacific oceans.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 46, line 24, to increase the total appropriation for transportation of the Army and its supplies from $11,012,175.40 to $11,286,612.40.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 47, line 13, after the word "until," to strike out "the close of the fiscal year 1910" and insert "expended," so as to make the clause read:

For the construction and maintenance of military and post roads, bridges, and trails in the district of Alaska, to be expended under the direction of the board of road commissioners described in section 2 of an act entitled "An act to provide for the construction and maintenance of roads, the establishment and maintenance of schools, and the care and support of insane persons in the district of Alaska, and for other purposes," approved January 27, 1905, and to be expended conformably to the provisions of said act, $250,000, to remain available until expended.

Mr. BACON. That is the same thing we had before, Mr. President.

Mr. WARREN. Let the amendment be rejected, Mr. President.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment is disagreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Military Affairs was, on page 47, line 16, after the word "construction," to insert "and repair;" in line 17, after the word "roads," to insert "walks;" in line 19, after the word "wharves," to insert "for the pay of employees;" and in line 21, before the word "dollars," to strike out "thousand" and insert "and ninety-four thousand three hundred and seventy-eight," so as to make the clause read:

Roads, walks, wharves, and drainage: For the construction and repair by the Quartermaster's Department of roads, walks, and wharves, for payment of extra-duty pay to enlisted men employed in opening roads and in building wharves, for the pay of employees, and for the disposal of drainage, $994,378.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was on page 47, line 23, after the word "posts," to insert "and stations;" in line 25, after the word "distance," to strike out "and;" in the same line after the word "sewage," to insert "for repairs to water and sewer systems, and for hire of employees;" and on page 48, in line 3, before the word "dollars," to insert "seven hundred and eleven thousand two hundred and seventy-five," so as to make the clause read:

Water and sewers at military posts: For procuring and introducing water to buildings at such military posts and stations as from their situation require it to be brought from a distance; for the disposal of sewage; for repairs to water and sewer systems, and for hire of employees, $2,711,275.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 48, line 8, after the word "sites," to strike out "when" and insert "and such additions to existing military reservations as may be," so as to make the clause read:

Barracks and quarters, Philippine Islands: Continuing the work of providing for the proper shelter and protection of officers and enlisted men of the Army of the United States lawfully on duty in the Philippine Islands, including payment of rents, the acquisition of title to building sites and such additions to existing military reservations as may be necessary, and including also shelter for the animals and supplies, and all other buildings necessary for post administration purposes, $731,022.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 49, line 12, after the word "garrisons," to strike out "$320,366" and insert "$545,366:

Provided, That not to exceed the following sums may be used in the erection of modern sanitary hospitals at the posts named: Thirty-five thousand dollars at Boise Barracks, Idaho; $65,000 to enlarge the hospital at Fort D. A. Russell, Wyo.; $50,000 to enlarge the hospital at Fort Sam Houston, Tex.; $40,000 to enlarge the hospital at Fort Slocum, N. Y.; $25,000 to enlarge the hospital at Fort Robinson, Nebr.; $20,000 to complete the hospital at Columbus Barracks, Ohio, and $20,000 to complete the hospital at Jefferson Barracks, Mo.;" so as to make the clause read:

A. Russell, Wyo.; $50,000 to enlarge the hospital at Fort Sam Houston, Tex.; $40,000 to enlarge the hospital at Fort Slocum, N. Y.; $25,000 to enlarge the hospital at Fort Robinson, Nebr.; $20,000 to complete the hospital at Columbus Barracks, Ohio, and $20,000 to complete the hospital at Jefferson Barracks, Mo.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 50, line 13, to increase the appropriation for shooting galleries and ranges from $156,000 to $191,850.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 50, line 18, after the word "Minnesota," to insert the following proviso:

Provided further, That $35,850 shall be immediately available for the acquisition of not less than 358½ acres of land adjacent to the rifle range at Fort Des Moines, Iowa, to be used as an extension of said range.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Medical Department," on page 52, line 18, after the word "dollars," to insert the following proviso:

Provided, That hereafter the Secretary of War may, in his discretion, contract for the care, maintenance, and treatment of the insane natives of the Philippine Islands serving in the Army of the United States at any asylum in the Philippine Islands in all cases which he is now authorized by law to cause to be sent to the Government Hospital for the Insane in the District of Columbia.

Mr. WARREN. I desire to say right there that this is the existing law; but we neglected in the last Army appropriation bill to put in the word "hereafter," so that it only applied to last year. We inserted this amendment for that reason.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, as I understand the amendment, it leaves it discretionary to the Secretary of War whether he shall send these natives to the asylum in the Philippines or send them, as heretofore, to the Government Hospital for the Insane in the District of Columbia. Am I correct in that?

Mr. WARREN. Yes.

Mr. BACON. I should like to ask—I suppose the committee, of course, considered this, and I am asking simply for information—why that was not made mandatory instead of discretionary? It seems to me that if there are proper Government institutions in the Philippine Islands where these unfortunates can be cared for, it ought to be made a requirement rather than placed in the discretion of the War Department.

Mr. WARREN. I will say to the Senator from Georgia that he gets the same effect here, but he does not put the Secretary in a position where he is compelled to submit to extortion if it should be attempted on the part of private or semipublic hospitals.

Mr. BACON. Is it understood that that is the rule which the Secretary of War must follow?

Mr. WARREN. Yes.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Military Affairs was at the top of page 53, to insert:

For the purchase of special apparatus and supplies for field medical equipment, in addition to those purchased out of the regular appropriation for the Medical and Hospital Department, to be immediately available and to remain available until expended, $200,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 53, line 11, to reduce the appropriation for the library of the Surgeon-General's Office, including the purchase of necessary books of reference and periodicals, from $10,000 to $5,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 55, line 7, after the word "expenses," to strike out "Provided further, That no part of this appropriation shall be used to pay double salaries to any employee of the Engineer School," so as to read:

Provided, That the traveling expenses herein provided for shall be in lieu of mileage and other allowances; and to provide means for the theoretical and practical instruction at the Engineer School by the purchase of text-books, books of reference, scientific and professional papers, and for other absolutely necessary expenses, $25,000.

Mr. KEAN. What is the proviso which it is proposed to strike out, Mr. President?

Mr. WARREN. I will say to the Senator that this proviso was put in under a misapprehension. It might look, if it had been left in, as if it were necessary to legislate against the payment of double salaries, and so it was thought better to strike the proviso out. It does not mean that anybody is receiving, has received, or shall receive double pay, or anything like that.

Mr. KEAN. I want to compliment the Senator on one reduction in his bill. On page 53 I see he strikes out "ten" and inserts "five" in the item making provision for the library of the Surgeon-General's Office—a peaceful pursuit.

Mr. WARREN. I am very glad to have the Senator's compliment even on one item in the bill.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Military Affairs was, under the subhead "Ordnance Department," on page 56, line 1, before the word "service," to strike out "of" and insert "for," so as to make the clause read:

Ordnance service: For the current expenses of the Ordnance Department, in connection with purchasing, receiving, storing, and issuing ordnance and ordnance stores, comprising police and office duties, rents, tolls, fuel, light, water, and advertising, stationery, and office furniture, tools, and instruments for service; for incidental expenses of the ordnance service and those attending practical trials and tests of ordnance, small arms, and other ordnance stores; and for publications for libraries of the Ordnance Department, including the Ordnance Office, and payment for mechanical labor in the office of the Chief of Ordnance, $300,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 56, line 23, after the word "service," to insert "and ammunition of older than current models may be issued for target practice and instruction to the educational institutions and State soldiers' and sailors' orphans' homes to which issues of small arms are lawfully made," so as to make the clause read:

Small-arms target practice: Ammunition, targets, and other accessories for small-arms and machine-gun target practice and instruction; marksmen's medals, prize arms, and insignia for all arms of the service; and ammunition of older than current models may be issued for target practice and instruction to the educational institutions and State soldiers' and sailors' orphans' homes to which issues of small arms are lawfully made, $1,300,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 57, line 5, after the word "material," to insert "and machine and automatic guns, including their carriages, sights, implements, and equipments;" and in line 17, before the word "thousand," to strike out "five hundred and fifty" and insert "eight hundred," so as to make the clause read:

Field artillery for organized militia: For the purpose of procuring field-artillery material and machine and automatic guns, including their carriages, sights, implements, and equipments, for the organized militia of the several States, Territories, and the District of Columbia, without cost to the said States, Territories, or the District of Columbia, but to remain the property of the United States and to be accounted for in the manner now prescribed by law, the Secretary of War is hereby authorized, under such regulations as he may prescribe, on the requisitions of the governors of the several States and Territories or the commanding general of the militia of the District of Columbia, to issue said artillery material to the organized militia; and the sum of $800,000 is hereby appropriated and made immediately available until expended for the procurement and issue of the articles constituting the same.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 57, line 22, after the word "armories," to insert "and for the purchase, manufacture, and test of machine and automatic guns, including their carriages, sights, implements, and equipments;" and, on page 58, line 2, before the word "seventy-eight," to strike out "one million seven hundred and," and insert "two million," so as to make the clause read:

Manufacture of arms: For manufacturing, repairing, procuring, and issuing arms at the national armories, and for the purchase, manufacture, and test of machine and automatic guns, including their carriages, sights, implements, and equipments, $2,078,158.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 58, line 20, after the word "dollars," to strike out the following proviso:

Provided, That the trophies and medals herein authorized shall be contested for only by the enlisted men of the Army, Navy, Marine Corps, and the National Guard or organized militia of the several States, Territories, and of the District of Columbia.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 59, line 7, after the word "dollars," to insert the following proviso:

Provided, That in time of war, or threatened war, such equipment may, in the discretion of the Secretary of War, be withdrawn from armories or other places where it is in use by the State coast artillery organizations, and may be used in the fortifications of the United States.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 59, line 16, after the word "them," to insert "to heads of Executive Departments of the Government, and to Members of Congress," so as to make the clause read:

Sales of articles of ordnance property are authorized to educational institutions and State soldiers' and sailors' orphans' homes for maintaining the ordnance and ordnance stores issued to them, to heads of Executive Departments of the Government, and to Members of Congress.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 59, after line 21, to insert:

Whenever proposals are invited for the furnishing of articles of ordnance property, the character of which or the ingredients thereof are of such a nature that the interests of the public service would be injured by publicly divulging them, the Chief of Ordnance is authorized to purchase such articles in such manner as he may deem most economical and efficient.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 60, after line 3, to insert:

For the construction of a suitable fence of iron or steel about the monument erected in 1883 on the Big Hole Battlefield, State of Montana, for the transportation and other necessary expenses in inclosing and restoring the monument, and for the preservation of the same, $1,200, or as much thereof as may be necessary.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 60, after line 10, to insert:

For the construction at Fort Bayard, N. Mex., of the necessary quarters for officers and a suitable building for quarters for Army nurses, $214,100.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was concluded.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President——

Mr. WARREN. The Senator from Montana has an amendment which he desires to offer.

Mr. KEAN. Does the Senator from Wyoming propose to have this bill disposed of to-night?

Mr. WARREN. I rather think the Senate——

Mr. KEAN. I have no objection.

Mr. WARREN. I should like to complete it. There are one or two matters which will take perhaps three or four minutes, and then I will agree to have the bill laid aside if Senators so desire, but I prefer to complete it.

Mr. CARTER. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Montana will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 50, after line 23, it is proposed to insert as a new paragraph the following:

For the purchase of a water right and necessary land connected therewith for a permanent water supply for Fort William Henry Harrison, in Montana, $20,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

Mr. WARREN. The committee accepts the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, I call the attention of the Senator from Wyoming to page 47, and to line 23 of that page, and suggest that after the word "buildings" the words "and premises" be inserted, for the reason that in bringing a water supply to a post and in confining the use exclusively to buildings, the watering of the parade grounds and walks would probably be excluded.

Mr. WARREN. I will accept such an amendment as the Senator proposes.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 47, line 23, after the word "buildings," it is proposed to insert "and premises," so as to read:

For procuring and introducing water to buildings and premises at such military posts, etc.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Montana.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, there seems to be a desire to conclude the consideration of the bill to-night, and I therefore ask that it be put upon its passage.

Mr. KEAN. I will ask the Senator what disposition has been made of the amendment on page 18 in regard to the Soldiers' Home? I had not noticed before that similar language was in the bill as it came from the House.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator alludes to the first paragraph on page 18?

Mr. KEAN. Yes; it being the item in regard to the repeal of sections 1280, 1281, and 1284 of the Revised Statutes in regard to the Soldiers' Home.

Mr. WARREN. I will say to the Senator that, unless there is a sufficient fund, there will be no misunderstanding and the conferees will, of course, drop that provision out. It is in another place in the House bill, and it is all open to amendment since the committee took out the language of the House bill and put this amendment in.

Mr. KEAN. Yes; I see on page 11 the House inserted the same language that we have now in the bill on page 18.

Mr. WARREN. If the Senator moves to strike it out, I will accept the amendment.

Mr. KEAN. I move to strike it out, not that I have any objection to it, for I do not know about it; but it will be in conference in any event in view of the amendment on page 11.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment has already been agreed to; but in the absence of objection, it will be considered as open to amendment. The amendment of the Senator from New Jersey to the amendment of the committee will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 18, beginning in line 1 of the committee amendment, it is proposed to strike out:

That sections 1280, 1281, and 1284 of the Revised Statutes be, and are hereby, repealed, and so much of section 4819 as pertains to the deduction of 12½ cents per month from the pay of every soldier of the Regular Army for the benefit of the Soldiers' Home be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. CLAY. With the permission of the Senator from Wyoming, I will say that the estimates made by the War Department for the total expenditures of the Army were $89,755,833.75. The House passed the bill carrying $84,207,566.56, about $5,000,000 less than the estimates made by the War Department. The bill as it is now and as it will probably pass the Senate carries $98,820,409.12, an increase of $14,612,843.56, making the amount that we appropriate about $10,000,000 more than the estimates made by the War Department.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President——

Mr. CLAY. One moment——

Mr. WARREN. I should like to correct the Senator. The Senator is not right.

Mr. CLAY. Very well.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator states that the estimate of the War Department is $89,000,000 and over. That is true as to the first Book of Estimates made up in the middle of last summer and presented to Congress early in the session; but following that, on the same page of the committee report or the next one, he will find other estimates amounting to $7,951,200, which carry the estimates above $103,000,000.

Mr. CLAY. I was simply reading from the document that I have before me.

Mr. WARREN. Yes; but you did not read all of it.

Mr. CLAY. It is an unusual thing for Congress to pass a bill carrying more money to pay the expenses of a Department than the estimates call for.

Mr. WARREN. This bill does not do that.

Mr. CLAY. Observation teaches me that the estimates in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred are always larger than the appropriations ought to be. For instance, take the fortifications bill. If I remember correctly, the estimates were $38,000,000. The House passed a bill carrying $8,000,000; and there is a bill now before the Senate with recommendations for $10,000,000. It is always best to be below the estimates instead of above the estimates, and it is generally on the safe side to be considerably lower than the estimates.

Mr. WARREN. It is too late to take up much time with the matter the Senator from Georgia refers to, but I will say that this is an annual supply bill, and the aggregate of the estimates is supposed to be exactly what it will cost to supply the Army. The fortifications bill is an estimate of what we might, under certain conditions, need to fortify our coast, and it leaves the matter of how much we should provide in the year given entirely to Congress. As to these estimates, the Senator should remember—and he will see in a moment—that when the $89,000,000 estimate came in, it did not include anything for the increase of pay of the Army.

Mr. CLAY. That accounts for $7,000,000 of it.

Mr. WARREN. It accounts for more than that, because the estimate is for more, but we put it on in different places. The estimates from the Department amount to over $103,000,000, and we are appropriating by this bill something over $98,000,000.

Mr. CLAY. Will the Senator tell us when the supplementary estimates were filed?

Mr. WARREN. They will be found right along in the list from day to day, following the filing of the general estimates.

Mr. CLAY. This document seems to have been made——

Mr. WARREN. That, Mr. President, is this large book of the principal estimates (exhibiting) that was made up in the summer, preceding the opening of the session.

Mr. CLAY. When was the estimate of $89,000,000 filed?

Mr. WARREN. That was made up last summer, and was brought before Congress when it met in December. It had been before the Department prior to that time. Some of the estimates were made perhaps before the end of the last fiscal year, and others were made after the 1st of July.

Mr. CLAY. The Senator knows that the practice of making estimates and sending them to Congress and then coming before the committees a few days before the committees act and filing additional estimates, is not a very good practice.

Mr. WARREN. But it must be held to be a good practice if, for the purpose of enacting legislation, we shall call for them as we did in the case of the increase in the pay of the Army.

Mr. CLAY. I agree with the Senator that the item of $7,000,000 additional pay on account of the increase in the pay of the Army is correct. The estimates for that ought to have been made; but my experience and observation have taught me that, in many instances, a few days before the Committee on Appropriations or the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, for instance, act on an appropriation bill, we find additional estimates coming in carrying several hundred thousand or a million dollars, and I do not believe that to be a good practice.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. CULLOM. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The House divided, and there were—ayes 130, noes 80.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I call for tellers.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi demands tellers.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that that motion is clearly dilatory. It is a very decisive vote.

The SPEAKER. The Chair holds the motion is dilatory.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Then, Mr. Speaker, I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken, and there were—yeas 240, nays 34, answered "present" 11, not voting 103, as follows:

EMPLOYERS' LIABILITY BILL.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill H. R. 20310, the employers' liability bill.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. STERLING] moves to suspend the rules and pass the bill (H. R. 20310), which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 20310) relating to the liability of common carriers by railroad to their employees in certain cases.

Be it enacted, etc., That every common carrier by railroad while engaging in commerce between any of the several States or Territories, or between any of the States and Territories, or between the District of Columbia and any of the States or Territories, or between the District of Columbia or any of the States or Territories and any foreign nation or nations, shall be liable in damages to any person suffering injury while he is employed by such carrier in such commerce, or, in case of the death of such employee, to his or her personal representative, for the benefit of the surviving widow or husband and children of such employee; and, if none, then of such employee's parents; and, if none, then of the next of kin dependent upon such employee; and, such injury or death resulting in whole or in part from the negligence of any of the officers, agents, or employees of such carrier, or by reason of any defect or insufficiency, due to its negligence, in its cars, engines, appliances, machinery, track, roadbed, works, boats, wharves, or other equipment.

SEC. 2. That every common carrier by railroad in the Territories, the District of Columbia, the Panama Canal Zone, or other possessions of the United States shall be liable in damages to any person suffering injury while he is employed by such carrier in any of said jurisdictions, or, in case of the death of such employee, to his or her personal representative, for the benefit of the surviving widow or husband and children of such employee; and, if none, then of such employee's parents; and, if none, then of the next of kin dependent upon such employee, for such injury or death resulting in whole or in part from the negligence of any of the officers, agents, or employees of such carrier, or by reason of any defect or insufficiency, due to its negligence, in its cars, engines, appliances, machinery, track, roadbed, works, boats, wharves, or other equipment.

SEC. 3. That in all actions hereafter brought against any such common carrier by railroad to recover damages for personal injuries to an employee, or where such injuries have resulted in his death, the fact that the employee may have been guilty of contributory negligence shall not bar a recovery, but the damages shall be diminished by the jury in proportion to the amount of negligence attributable to such employee: Provided, That no such employee who may be injured or killed shall be held to have been guilty of contributory negligence in any case where the violation by such common carrier of any statute enacted for the safety of employees contributed to the injury or death of such employee.

SEC. 4. That in any action brought against any common carrier under or by virtue of any of the provisions of this act to recover damages for injuries to, or the death of, any of its employees, such employee shall not be held to have assumed the risks of his employment in any case where the violation by such common carrier of any statute enacted for the safety of employees contributed to the injury or death of such employee.

SEC. 5. That any contract, rule, regulation, or device whatsoever, the purpose or intent of which shall be to enable any common carrier to exempt itself from any liability created by this act, shall to that extent be void: Provided, That in any action brought against any such common carrier under or by virtue of any of the provisions of this act, such common carrier may set off therein any sum it has contributed or paid to any insurance, relief benefit, or indemnity that may have been paid to the injured employee or the person entitled thereto on account of the injury or death for which said action was brought.

SEC. 6. That no action shall be maintained under this act unless commenced within two years from the day the cause of action accrued.

SEC. 7. That the term "common carrier" as used in this act shall include the receiver or receivers or other persons or corporations charged with the duty of the management and operation of the business of a common carrier.

SEC. 8. That nothing in this act shall be held to limit the duty or liability of common carriers or to impair the rights of their employees under any other act or acts of Congress, or to affect the prosecution of any pending proceeding or right of action under the act of Congress entitled "An act relating to liability of common carriers in the District of Columbia and Territories, and to common carriers engaged in commerce between the States and between the States and foreign nations to their employees," approved June 11, 1906.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I demand a second.

The SPEAKER. Is the gentleman from Texas against the bill?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I am against the bill, and on the committee, and filed a minority view.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that a second may be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. STERLING] is recognized for twenty minutes, and the gentleman from Maine [Mr. LITTLEFIELD] for twenty minutes.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. Speaker, the bill under consideration is what is known as the employers' liability bill. It relates to common carriers by railroads engaged in interstate commerce, commerce with foreign nations, in the District of Columbia, the Territories, the Canal Zone, and other possessions of the United States. The first two sections of the bill abolish the doctrine of fellow-servant in this line of commerce. Section 3 is a modification of the common-law doctrine of contributory negligence. It provides that contributory negligence shall not bar a recovery, but it further provides that the responsibility of the negligence of the employer and of the employee shall rest upon each. It requires the jury to reduce the damages in proportion to the negligence committed by the injured employee. The proviso in section 3 and section 4 provides that contributory negligence and assumption of risk shall not be charged to the employee where he is injured by reason of the violation of any statute by the employer that has been enacted for the safety of employees. That is to say, where a violation of any such statute contributes to the injury, then contributory negligence or assumption of risk can not be pleaded as a defense to the recovery of damages.

Section 5 of the bill provides that all contracts, rules, and regulations, which seek to exempt the employer, the common carrier, from liability created by this act shall be void so far as it seeks to produce that exemption. But in case the common carrier has paid any benefit or any insurance by virtue of such a contract, he shall be permitted to set it off in any claim for damages made by the employee.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Will the gentleman allow a question?

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STERLING. I yield.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I am in favor, I will say, of the pending bill. I believe it to be a just and a humane measure, but I would like to know if it was the intention of the Committee on the Judiciary that the bill should apply to interurban and street railroads, where it was applicable at all, as well as to street railroads operated by electric power? Would it apply to the street-railroad system in the city of Washington, or the system in Honolulu and Manila, for instance?

Mr. STERLING. I think it does.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. And electric interurban roads operating between States and Territories?

Mr. STERLING. Yes, sir. Mr. Speaker, I yield four minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY].

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, we are about to pass a meritorious bill, in which are embraced the rights of millions of American people. It should have been passed long ago by the present Congress, and I hope there will not be a single vote recorded against it upon the other side, although one gentleman on the Republican side has demanded a second for the purpose of opposing the enactment. We congratulate the country upon the report from the Committee on the Judiciary, and I believe it can be safely promised that every vote on this side of the House will be promptly and cheerfully given in behalf of the measure. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Speaker, during the limited time allotted me I can not go into details, but can safely state that we have reported to this House what we deem to be a constitutional law. [Applause.] We have endeavored to embrace within its terms only provisions that refer to commerce between States. We concede that the American Congress has no power and has no right to touch the internal commerce of the States. This bill is fashioned solely with the intention of governing interstate commerce and matters arising out of the same. We can not say what view the Supreme Court of the United States may take of it, because when the last act was before that body four justices believed that Congress was only attempting to deal with interstate commerce, whereas five of them declared that we were undertaking to invade the domain of State jurisdiction and deal with intrastate commerce.

Let me submit in brief language the provisions of this measure, in order that we may thoroughly understand it. At common law there was no right of recovery for damages for death resulting from negligence; by this act we authorize recovery for injury or death. At common law there could be no recovery against the employer for the neglect of fellow-servants engaged in common employment; by this act we abrogate that ancient doctrine and permit recovery for the negligence of the officers, agents, or employees, although the one guilty of negligence is a fellow-servant of the one injured or killed. At common law the one who had contributed by his own negligence to his injury could not recover, and also for the negligence of another which had been the concurring cause; by this law we authorize a recovery in such cases and only demand that the damages shall be diminished by the jury in proportion to the amount of negligence attributable to such employee. Furthermore, if the damage is attributable to the violation of a statute by the employer, contributory negligence can not be imputed to the employee. At common law the employer could bind the employee by contract to renounce his right to damage in cases of injury in the course of employment; we here abrogate that rule of the common law. This statute forbids such contract. We abolish the common-law doctrine of fellow-servant, a doctrine long ago discontinued by many States. Hence we have changed four rules of the common law. These changes are in obedience to the demands of humanity, justice, and the sacred rights of millions of American citizens engaged in hazardous employments.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, the common law is changed in four respects. Favoring most cordially its every provision, I hope that this bill will be promptly passed. [Loud applause.]

Mr. STERLING. I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Mr. Speaker, this bill, in section 3, practically abolishes the doctrine of contributory negligence and is a very pronounced innovation on existing law. There are but two or three States that have any legislation anything like parallel to this proposition, and it did not appear before the committee that there had been such experience under that legislation as to enable us to judge one way or the other whether this legislation would be wise or unwise. I should not feel at liberty to vote for this bill for that reason, if there were no other; but my objections to the bill are mainly legal in their character. They are stated as concisely and as briefly as I can state them in the minority views, and I should like to have the Clerk read them, excluding the citations and discussions of the authorities, in support of the views found on pages 79 to 87 and 92 to 94, inclusive. I ask unanimous consent that the remainder may be inserted in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I do.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I observe that the bill, as originally introduced by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. STERLING], applied to all common carriers.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. The commitee have inserted in the third line the words "by railroad," so that it now reads, "any common carrier by railroad."

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. That is correct.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Has the gentleman thought whether or not there is a constitutional question here involving a declaration by Congress of a legislative discrimination against one class of common carriers?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I did consider that part of the bill. The question of class legislation is discussed in the second paragraph of the minority views.

If the Clerk will read and the House will listen to the views we prepared, they will get a very clear idea of the position of the minority on this legislation.

The Clerk read as follows:

VIEWS OF THE MINORITY.

The undersigned respectfully submit their minority views in connection with H. R. 17036, the committee's draft known as H. R. 20194, and the committee's redraft known as H. R. 20310, as follows:

I.

The first question that properly arises in connection with this proposed legislation is whether or not the changing of the law governing the liability of the master to the servant engaged in interstate commerce is a regulation of interstate commerce. It seems to be settled in the Howard case (Howard, admx., etc., v. Ill. Cen. R. R. Co., Jan. 6, 1908) and in the Adair case (Adair v. U. S., Jan. 27, 1908) that Congress has no power to regulate "persons because they engage in interstate commerce," and that its power of regulation is "confined solely to regulating the interstate-commerce business which such persons may do." While it is quite true that this question was the first in order discussed and passed upon in the Howard case, and is referred to with approval in the Adair case, in each case it was clearly a dictum, too clear for discussion in the Adair case, and in the Howard case asserted to be a dictum by three eminent members of the court, Mr. Chief Justice Fuller and Justices Peckham and Brewer.

The second proposition in the Howard case upon which the court held the act unconstitutional turned upon an entirely different legal question, with which the first proposition has no connection whatever. The first question passing upon the right to regulate the relation between master and servant was in no sense essential to the result reached in the opinion, which result was reached for an entirely different reason, viz, because the bill understood to control and regulate both interstate and State commerce. As this question is, therefore, still open, we do not think this bill should go from the Judiciary Committee with the exercise of this power to regulate the relation between master and servant as an essential and integral factor of interstate commerce unchallenged. We are unable to see how interstate commerce can be impeded, obstructed, or hindered, or facilitated, promoted, or aided, either directly or indirectly, in the slightest degree in either case, because the doctrine of fellow-servant does or does not apply as a matter of liability between the employer and the employee engaged in interstate commerce.

In the argument of the dictum sustaining this power it is not even intimated that the safety or security of passengers or freight is in any way subserved or that its transportation is in any way facilitated by this effort to regulate and control. To be sure the arbitrary assertion is made in the opinion that such a regulation is a "regulation of interstate commerce," but it is respectfully submitted that, as a matter of reasoning, this is hardly sufficient to establish the proposition. To assert it is one thing and to sustain it by adequate legal reasoning is quite another. The bill provides that the master engaged in interstate commerce is to be liable to his employee also engaged in interstate commerce, notwithstanding the injury was sustained through the negligence of a coemployee. Is that really a regulation of interstate commerce? It is pertinent to inquire in what way does this change of legal relation between the employer and employee, both engaged in interstate commerce, affect the interstate commerce itself, or in what way does it regulate it? That, as we understand it, is the test. Under the existing law, does the fact that the master is not liable to a coemployee for the negligence of a fellow-servant in any way embarrass, impede, or obstruct interstate commerce, or, upon the other hand, does the proposed change tend to facilitate, promote, or expedite such commerce? We are not aware that anyone pretends that either of these consequences follows; on the contrary, the parties who are most earnestly urging this legislation invariably insist that the fellow-servant doctrine has no connection whatever, either theoretical or actual, with the safety of the enterprise to which it applies.

Will any more freight or passengers be carried in interstate commerce or will freight or passengers be carried more rapidly or more safely after this bill becomes a law than now? No one even pretends to claim it. If this change of legal relation between employer and employee is really a regulation of commerce it would seem necessarily that there must be some point of contact between the regulation and the commerce itself, some place or some phase where the proposed regulation will produce some result upon the commerce regulated, at least theoretically or technically, but this place or phase or result no one has ever been able to point out, and in fact no attempt of that kind, so far as we know, has been made. Until it can be shown that there is such point of contact or that the regulation regulates in some way, in some place, or has some connection with some phase of interstate commerce we feel bound to conclude that the proposed bill is an attempt to regulate the carrier because he is engaged in interstate commerce, which the court has held could not be done, and not a regulation of the commerce itself in which the carrier is engaged, and therefore beyond the domain of the Congress. If it is a regulation, must not the regulation be substantial and appreciable, and of such a character that it can be ascertained, at least in theory?

If it is suggested that it is a regulation of an instrumentality of interstate commerce, the same considerations apply. What is the instrumentality that it attempts to regulate, and in what way and in what manner does it regulate the instrumentality? What aid does the instrumentality receive from this alleged regulation of interstate commerce? From what incumbrance is it relieved? We have never heard of any answer to these questions, and until they are answered we do not believe the legislation can be sustained.

We have examined with care the able, exhaustive, and learned opinion of Mr. Justice Moody, and respectfully submit that in all of the legislation to which he refers the effect of the regulation upon interstate commerce was obvious, and that there is no case cited by him where the power to regulate was sustained; where the point of connection with interstate commerce did not clearly appear. As we understand it, the real reason upon which he relies and upon which he fundamentally disagrees with the majority of the court is well indicated when he says: "How poor and meager the power would be if whenever it was exercised the legislator must pause to consider whether the action proposed regulated commerce or merely regulated the conduct of persons engaged in commerce," insisting that the power must extend to "the conduct of persons engaged in commerce."

II.

We think the bill should be confined in its operation to the extrahazardous risks involved in the actual operation of interstate railroads, assuming that Congress has power to regulate the carriers engaged in interstate commerce in the manner proposed. If this were a State statute, unless the language used in the bill is of such an indefinite, uncertain, and indeterminate character as to justify the court in holding that the act applied only to the extrahazardous risks involved in the actual operation of the road, it would, without any question, be held to be unconstitutional as being class legislation and depriving the railroad of the equal protection of the law guaranteed to it by the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution, which provides that no State shall "deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the law." In this connection we insert copious extracts from a brief upon this point furnished the committee by Mr. Benjamin D. Warfield, which, as we understand it, states the cases and their effect correctly.

BRIEF SUBMITTED BY MR. BENJAMIN D. WARFIELD.

In G. C. and S. F. R. Co. v. Ellis (165 U. S., 150), the Supreme Court of the United States declared a statute void which arbitrarily classified railroad companies exclusively, because the statute violated the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

Again, in Cotting v. Kansas City Stock Yards Company, etc. (183 U. S., 79), the Supreme Court of the United States held that a statute of Kansas violated the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States in that it applied to the Kansas City Stock Yards Company, but did not apply to other companies or corporations engaged in like business in Kansas. The Supreme Court of the United States, in the opinion in the Cotting case, quoted approvingly from the supreme court of Kansas in State v. Haun (61 Kans., 146), where a statute of that State, which provided for the payment of laborers in money, etc., was held unconstitutional on the ground that it was obnoxious to the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States, as follows:

"Everyone has a right to demand that he be governed by general rules, and a special statute which, without his consent, singles his case out as one to be regulated by a different law from that which is applied in all similar cases would not be legitimate legislation, but would be such an arbitrary mandate as is not within the province of free governments. Those who make the laws 'are to govern by promulgated, established laws, not to be varied in particular cases, but to have one rule for rich and poor, for the favorite at court and the countryman at plow.' This is a maxim in constitutional law, and by it we may test the authority and binding force of legislative enactments."

In Connelly v. Union Sewer Pipe Company (184 U. S., 540) the anti-trust statute of Illinois, 1893, was held to be unconstitutional because if violated the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States. The statute contained a section exempting from its operation agricultural products or live stock while in the hands of the producer or raiser.

The Supreme Court said:

"The difficulty is not met by saying that, generally speaking, the State, when enacting laws, may, in its discretion, make a classification of persons, firms, corporations, and associations in order to subserve public objects. For this court has held that classifications 'must always rest upon some difference which bears a reasonable and just relation to the act in respect to which the classification is proposed, and can never be made arbitrarily and without any such basis. * * * But arbitrary selection can never be justified by calling it classification. The equal protection demanded by the fourteenth amendment forbids this. * * * No duty rests more imperatively upon the courts than the enforcement of those constitutional provisions intended to secure that equality of rights which is the foundation of free government. * * * It is apparent that the mere fact of classification is not sufficient to relieve a statute from the reach of the equality clause of the fourteenth amendment, and that in all cases it must appear not only that a classification has been made, but also that it is one based upon some reasonable ground—some difference which bears a just and proper relation to the attempted classification—and is not a mere arbitrary selection.'"

In Adair v. United States, decided by the Supreme Court of the United States January 27, 1908, the court held section 10 of the act of Congress of June 1, 1898, unconstitutional and void. By that section Congress attempted to make it a misdemeanor against the United States for an employer or its officer or agent, among other things, to threaten any employee with loss of employment or unjustly discriminate against any employee because of his membership in a labor organization. During the course of the opinion of the court, delivered by Mr. Justice Harlan, it was said:

"It may be observed in passing that while that section makes it a crime against the United States to unjustly discriminate against an employee of an interstate carrier because of his being a member of a labor organization it does not make it a crime to unjustly discriminate against an employee of the carrier because of his not being a member of such organization."

And again:

"The first inquiry is whether the part of the tenth section of the act of 1898 upon which the first count of the indictment was based is repugnant to the fifth amendment of the Constitution declaring that no person shall be deprived of liberty or property without due process of law. In our opinion that section, in the particular mentioned, is an invasion of the personal liberty, as well as of the right of property, guaranteed by that amendment."

And again:

"We need scarcely repeat what this court has more than once said, that the power to regulate interstate commerce, great and paramount as that power is, can not be exerted in violation of any fundamental right secured by other provisions of the Constitution." (Gibbons v. Ogden, 9 Wheat., 1, 196; Lottery Case, 188 U. S., 321, 353.)

While the exact question for which we are here contending has not been adjudicated by the Supreme Court of the United States for the reason that that court has not yet been called upon to decide the question, its decision in Howard v. I. C. R. Co., etc., decided January 6, 1907, whereby the employers' liability act of July 11, 1906, was held unconstitutional, having been decided on another ground, we earnestly insist that any statute of the character of the bills now pending in Congress above referred to, in order to withstand the fifth amendment to the Constitution of the United States, must be limited by its terms or construed by the courts as embracing only those interstate employees of interstate carriers who are engaged in extrahazardous employment—i. e., in those employments where the employees are exposed to dangers peculiar to railroading, those occasioned by the movements of engines, cars, and trains on tracks, or directly connected therewith, just as State statutes of similar import have been construed by the courts of last resort of the States enacting the statutes, in order that such statutes should not violate the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

The earliest of the State statutes which attempted to modify and alter the common-law rule of fellow-servants, so far as we are advised, was a statute of Iowa, enacted in 1862, and which will be found in the Iowa code of 1873, section 1707. The statute read as follows:

"Every corporation operating a railway shall be liable for all damages sustained by any person, including employees of such corporation, in consequence of the neglect of agents, or by any mismanagement of the engineers or other employees of the corporation, and in consequence of the willful wrongs, whether of commission or of omission, of such agents, engineers, or other employees, when such wrongs are in any manner connected with use and operation of any railway on or about which they shall be employed, and no contract which restricts such liability shall be legal or binding."

The supreme court of Iowa, in order to hold the statute just quoted constitutional, has held that it applied only to dangers peculiar to railroading, those occasioned by the movements of engines, cars, and machinery on tracks or directly connected therewith. (Akeson v. R. Co., 75 N. W., 676.)

During the course of that opinion this language was used:

"The peculiarity of the railroad business which distinguishes it from any other is the movement of vehicles or machinery of great weight on the track by steam or other power, and the dangers incident to such movements are those the statute was intended to guard against. If, then, the injury is received by an employee whose work exposes him to the hazards of moving trains, cars, engines, or machinery on the track, and is caused by the negligence of a coemployee in the actual movement thereof, or in any manner directly connected therewith, the statute applies, and recovery may be had. Beyond this the statute affords no protection. The purpose of the lawmakers was evidently not to make men, because employed by railroad companies, favorites of the law, but to afford protection owing to the peculiar hazards of their situation."

In the Akeson case the supreme court of Iowa held that the statute did not apply in favor of a person employed to coal engines from coal cars alongside of the engine, by carrying coal from the car to the tender in wheelbarrows, over planks laid as a footway from the car to the tender, and who was injured by the negligence of a coservant in removing a plank over which the wheelbarrows were operated between the coal car and the engine tender.

In Luce v. R. Co. (67 Iowa, 75; 24 N. W., 600), the plaintiff was employed in the coal house of a railroad company, and while hoisting coal for the purpose of coaling an engine was struck by the crane by which the coal was hoisted, owing to the negligence of a coservant. It was held that the statute did not apply, the court saying:

"The danger arising from the use of the crane does not appear to have been greater or less by the fact that it was used loading a railroad car, nor does it appear that the plaintiff while engaged in his duty was exposed to any danger from the operation of the road."

To the same effect, see Stroble v. R. Co. (70 Iowa, 555; 31 N. W., 63), Reddington v. C., M. & St. P. R. Co. (78 N. W., 800), Foley v. Chicago, etc., R. Co. (64 Iowa, 644; 21 N W., 124), in the latter of which cases the supreme court of Iowa denied a recovery to a car repairer for injuries received while repairing a car on a sidetrack, by reason of the alleged negligence of a coemployee in failing to block the wheels of the car. Foley was injured by a movement of the car while he was under it engaged in repairing it. In the opinion in the Foley case the supreme court of Iowa declared that with the single exception of Deppe v. R. Co. (36 Iowa, 52), in which a recovery was allowed to an employee while shoveling earth onto flat cars, by the caving in of a bank of earth, all of the occasions on which that court had held railroad companies liable under the statute were those where the injury was received by the movement of cars or engines upon the track.

The employers' liability act of Minnesota (chap. 13. Gen. Laws 1887) declares:

"Every railroad corporation owning or operating a railroad in this State shall be liable for all damages sustained by any agent or servant thereof, by reason of the negligence of any other agent or servant thereof, without contributory negligence on his part, when sustained within this State, and no contract, rule, or regulation between such corporation and any agent or servant shall impair or diminish such liability: Provided, That nothing in this act shall be so construed as to render any railroad company liable for damages sustained by any employee, agent, or servant, while engaged in the construction of a new road, or any part thereof, not open to public travel or use."

The supreme court of Minnesota, in Lavallee v. St. P., M. and M. R. Co. (40 Minn., 249; 41 N. W., 974), Johnson v. St. P. and D. R. Co. (43 Minn., 222; 45 N. W., 156; 8 L. R. A., 419), and in Jemming v. Great Northern Ry. Co. (104 N. W., 1079), and in other cases has construed the Minnesota statute as applying only to those employees of railroads who are engaged in the operation of railroads.

In the Lavallee case the opinion of the court, by Chief Justice Gilfillan, does not show the precise nature of Lavallee's employment. The opinion does say, however, that he and the persons through whose negligence he received the injury from which he died were fellow-servants. The court, after stating that the question for decision was whether the Minnesota statute includes all employees, agents, and servants of a railroad corporation, without regard to the character of the business in which they were employed, declared that while taken literally the statute did so, that it was evident that the statute could not be taken literally. After referring to the decisions of the courts of last resort of some of the other States, which had enacted similar statutes, and quoting approvingly from R. Co. v. Mackey (127 U. S., 205), where the character of the employee injured was such that no question could be made that he came within the operation of the Kansas statute, if it was to be given any effect whatever, and after discussing the power of legislatures to classify subjects of legislation, said, respecting the Minnesota statute:

"Applying this test, it is impossible to avoid the conclusion that the statute, if construed as appellant claims it ought to be, would be class legislation, not applying upon the same terms to all in the same situation, nor having any apparent natural reason for any distinction.

"The frequency and magnitude of the dangers to which those employed in operating railroads are exposed; the difficulty, sometimes impossibility, of escaping from them with any amount of care, when they come; the fact that a great number of men are employed, cooperating in the same work, so that no one of them can know all the others, their competency, skill, and care, so that he may be said to voluntarily assume the risk arising from the want of skill or care by any one of the number—are a sufficient reason for applying a rule of liability on the part of the employer to the employee so employed different from that ordinarily applied between master and servant. But no just reason can be suggested why such difference should be founded, not on the character of the employment, nor of the danger to which those employed are exposed, but on the character only of the employer. We can see why the empolyers' liability should be greater when the business is that of operating a railroad, but can not see why one individual or corporation should be held to a rule of liability different from that applied to another, when the employment and its hazards are precisely the same. We can not illustrate this better than by using an illustration employed by the supreme court of Iowa in Deppe v. Railroad Co. (36 Iowa, 52): 'Suppose a railroad company employ several persons to cut the timber on its right of way where it is about to extend its road, and the landowner employs a like number of persons to cut the timber on a strip of equal length alongside such right of way. If one of each set of employees shall be injured by the negligence of a coemployee, and the railroad employee can under the statute maintain an action against his employer and the other can not, then it is clear that the law does not apply upon the same terms to all in the same situation.'

"The legislature might intend to make such a difference, but it would require unmistakable terms to make us think so. We do not find such to be the character of the terms used in this statute. That language is rather indicative that it was intended to confine its operation to the case of employees engaged in operating a railroad, and necessarily exposed to the hazards attending that business, and not to take in the case of all employees of a railroad company, without regard to the kind of work in which they are engaged."

In the Johnson case, supra, a crew of men, of which the plaintiff was one, was engaged in repairing a bridge on defendant's railroad, and in performing the work it was necessary to leave the draw partly open. Through the negligence of one of the crew the draw was left unfastened and was blown shut by the wind, and injured plaintiff while at work between the stationary part of the bridge and the draw. It was held that the Minnesota statute, supra, did not apply, and that the railroad company was not liable to Johnson. In the course of the opinion, after referring to the fact that in the Lavallee case the court had held that the statute applied only to the peculiar hazards due to the use and operation of railroads, that it must be construed as designed exclusively for the benefit of those who are, in the course of their employment, exposed to such hazards, and whose injuries are caused by them, the court said:

"And the more we consider the question, the more we are confirmed in the opinion that it is only when construed as subject to some such limitation that the statute can be sustained as a valid law. As was said in the case referred to, to avoid the imputation of 'class' legislation, the classification, in cases of special legislation, must be made upon some apparent, natural reason—some reason suggested by necessity, by such a difference in the situation and circumstances of the subjects placed in different classes as suggests the necessity or propriety of different legislation with respect to them. If a distinction is to be made as to the liability of employers to their employees, it must be based upon a difference in the nature of the employment, and not of the employers.

"One rule of liability can not be established for railway companies, merely as such, and another rule for other employees, under like circumstances and conditions, unless upon the theory suggested in Railway Co. v. Mackey (127 U. S., 205; 8 Sup. Ct. Rep., 1161), that the State may 'prescribe the liabilities under which corporations created by its laws shall conduct their business in the future, where no limitation is placed upon its power in this respect by their charters,' a proposition which, as thus broadly stated, that court, in view of its later utterances, could hardly have intended to announce. Indeed, the particular question now under consideration was not before the court, and, presumably, was not in mind. Neither would it relieve the act from the imputation of class legislation that it applies alike to all railroads.

"It has been sometimes loosely stated that special legislation is not class 'if all persons brought under its influence are treated alike under the same conditions.' But this is only half the truth. Not only must it treat alike, under the same conditions, all who are brought 'within its influence,' but in its classification it must bring within its influence all who are under the same conditions. Therefore, if a distinction is to be made between railway corporations and other employers as respects their liability to their employees, it must be based upon some difference in the nature of the employment, and can only extend to cases where such difference exists. Hence most courts, as notably in Iowa and Kansas, have held that similar statutes, although general in their terms, embrace only 'the peculiar hazards of railroading.' But, when we come to examine the adjudicated cases, we confess we are unable to discover any definite, consistent, or logical rule which the courts have applied in determining whether, upon the facts of a particular case, it fell within or without the statute. In some cases it has been held that the statute applied because the duty of the employees required them to ride upon the cars to the place of work, although the injury was not sustained while thus riding, and was not caused by, or in any manner connected with, the operation of the road. Such a position seems to us wholly illogical. Other cases have been held within the statute because the work being performed was necessary to the use and operation of the road, although the injury sustained was not caused by, or connected with, such use and operation. This, we think, is equally illogical. In fact, the proposition is so broad and indefinite as to bring within the act all employees, regardless of the nature of their employment; for the work of all, even clerks in offices, is, in a sense, necessary to the use and operation of the road.

"Therefore, after mature consideration, our conclusion is that, if any limitation is to be placed by the courts upon the application of this statute (and on constitutional grounds there must be) the only one which will furnish any definite or logical rule is to hold that it only applies to those employees who are exposed to the peculiar hazards incident to the use and operation of railroads, and whose injuries are the result of such dangers. We do not mean to say that there may not be reasons suggested by some differences in the nature of the employment which would warrant the legislature in placing some other hazards within the provisions of such a law; but if the courts should attempt to impose upon the general language of this statute any other limitation than the one suggested, they would be all at sea, without either rudder or compass. Applying the test suggested, it is plain that plaintiff's case is not within the provisions of the act. * * * As suggested by counsel for defendant, suppose there had been a wagon bridge over the St. Louis River alongside of this railroad bridge, and one of a crew engaged in repairing it had been injured under like circumstances. He could not have recovered from his employer. Yet the actual situation, both as to the nature of the employment and the cause of the injury, would have been the same in either case."

In Jemming v. Great Northern Railroad Company (104 N. W., 1079), decided by the supreme court of Minnesota, November 24, 1905, the plaintiff was injured while in the employ of the defendant railway company as a pitman, being one of a crew of nine men, consisting of an engineer, a crane man, a fireman, two jackmen, and four pitmen, who were operating a steam shovel in a gravel pit, operated by the railway company, and was injured by the negligent manner in which the engineer caused the bucket to swing from the ballast car into the pit. Jemming sought a recovery under the Minnesota statute above quoted; but the supreme court of Minnesota held that the statute did not apply, for the reason that plaintiff and the fellow-servant by whose negligence he was injured were not engaged in operating a railway at the time of the accident, and that Jemming was precluded from recovering because on common-law principles the servant whose negligence caused the injury was his fellow-servant. The court quoted approvingly from the Lavallee and Johnson cases, supra, and said of them:

"The rule, as thus established, that the statute includes only the class of servants exposed to injury by the dangers peculiar to the use and operation of railroads has never since been departed from by this court." (Citing many cases.)

The Minnesota statute was before the Supreme Court of the United States in Minnesota Iron Company v. Kline (199 U. S., 593). In that case the supreme court of Minnesota adjudged that Kline came within the operation of the statute. The Supreme Court referred to the fact that the Minnesota court had held that the act was confined to the dangers peculiar to railroads, and did not discriminate against railroad companies merely as such, and held that inasmuch as the statute as thus interpreted was not within the prohibition of the fourteenth amendment the court would not interfere with the construction put upon the statute by the supreme court of Minnesota. The Supreme Court of the United States declared in that case:

"Of course there is no objection to legislation being confined to a peculiar and well-defined class of perils."

In M. K. & T. R. Co. v. Medaris (60 Kans., 151; 55 Pac., 875), brought under the fellow-servant statute of Kansas of 1874 (Laws, 1874, chap. 93, sec. 1), the supreme court of Kansas held that the statute did not apply. He was employed in setting a curbing around an office building and depot of the railroad company at Parsons, Kans. The curbstones had been prepared elsewhere and shipped to Parsons and unloaded near the building around which they were to be placed. The men employed to set the curbing dug a ditch, and several of the curbstones were brought up and left on the side of the ditch ready to be placed. While setting a curbstone another one, which had been left standing unsupported on the edge of the ditch, was upset and fell upon the leg of Medaris, causing a permanent injury. In reversing a judgment obtained by him in the trial court the supreme court of Kansas said:

"Whether Medaris is entitled to the benefit of this law depends upon the character of the work in which he was engaged and not on the mere fact that he was an employee of a railroad company. The validity of the law has been sustained as against the charge that it was class legislation, on the ground that the hazardous character of the business of operating a railroad justified the passage of the law for the protection of those engaged in that service. The rule of liability applied under the statute is different from that which ordinarily applies between master and servant; but this difference is founded on the hazardous character of the service and is not intended as a discrimination between employers. The statute would certainly be open to objection if a different rule of liability was applied to a railroad company than is applied to other employers under like circumstances and conditions. The hazards incident to the use and operation of railroads is a natural and reasonable classification, which justifies the exceptional legislation, for if the statute was not given that interpretation, and limited in its operation to the protection of those engaged in the hazardous service, it could not be upheld."

And again:

"Here, however, the service which Medaris was performing did not expose him to the hazards peculiar to the business of using and operating a railroad. He was not at work on a railroad, and his injury was not caused by the operation of a railroad or the use of any railroad appliance. It is true there were railroad tracks near the place where he was at work, but no train was passing or near to the place where Medaris was at work at the time the injury was inflicted. It is true, also, that he was at work for a railroad company and upon the land of a railroad company, but this does not entitle him to the benefits of the act. He can only recover by showing that the service in which he was engaged exposed him to the peculiar perils incident to the operation of a railroad. As the jury specially found, the work in which he was engaged involved no more risk or hazard than it would if the same work was being done for an individual at the same time and place. The benefits of the act can no more be claimed by him than they could by the carpenter who laid the floor in the office building or nailed the shingles on its roof. No stronger claim could be made for him than could for a person injured while hauling the rock from the quarry to the place where the curbing was to be set. As was held by the supreme court of Minnesota, one rule of liability can not be established for a railroad company as such and another for other employers under like circumstances and conditions. To avoid the imputation of class legislation, the distinction must be based upon a difference in the nature of the employment: 'But no just reason can be suggested why such difference should be founded, not on the character of the employment nor on the dangers to which those employed are exposed, but on the character only of the employer. We can see why the employer's liability should be greater when the business is that of operating a railroad, but can not see why one individual or corporation should be held to a rule of liability different from that applied to another when the employment and its hazards are precisely the same.' Lavallee v. Railway Co. (40 Minn., 249; 41 N. W., 974). See also Johnson v. Railway Co. (Minn., 45; N. W., 156); Deppe v. Railroad Co. (36 Iowa, 52); Stroble v. Railway Co. (70 Iowa, 555; 31 N. W., 63). It is difficult to see how the validity of the law can be sustained unless it is interpreted, as was stated in Railway Co. v. Haley, supra, to 'embrace only those persons more or less exposed to the hazards of the business of railroading.' We feel compelled to hold that the plaintiff below was not engaged in that kind of service when the injury was inflicted, and therefore that no liability against the company, under the statute, arises in his favor."

The Kansas statute was before the Supreme Court of the United States in Missouri Pac. Ry. Co. v. Mackey (127 U. S., 205). Mackey was a locomotive fireman on one of the engines of the railroad company and was injured in a negligent collision caused by the engineer of another engine. If the statute was to be given any force whatever, it was bound to be applied in favor of Mackey, because he was unquestionably engaged in a hazardous branch of the railroad service. The Supreme Court of the United States construed the statute in the light of the facts of that case and held that it did not violate the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States. During the course of its opinion the court used this language:

"But the hazardous character of the business of operating a railway would seem to call for special legislation with respect to railroad corporations, having for its object the protection of their employees, as well as the safety of the public."

The statute was again before the Supreme Court of the United States in Railroad Co. v. Pontius (157 U. S., 209), and the court met the argument made on behalf of the railroad company that Pontius, a bridge builder, was not entitled to the benefits of the statute, because it only applied to employees exposed to peculiar hazards incident to the use and operation of a railroad, by saying:

"But the difficulty with this argument is that the State supreme court found upon the facts that, although the plaintiff's general employment was that of a bridge carpenter, he was engaged at the time the accident occurred, not in building a bridge, but in loading timbers on a car for transportation over the line of defendant's road; and Missouri Pac. Co. v. Haley (25 Kans., 35); Union Pacific Rwy. Co. v. Harris (33 Kans., 416), and Atchison, Topeka, etc., R. Co. v. Koehler (37 Kans., 463) were cited, in which cases it was held that a person employed upon a construction train to carry water with the men working with the train and to gather up tools and put them in the caboose or tool car; a section man employed by a railroad company to repair its roadbed and to take up old rails of its track and put in new ones, and a person injured while loading rails on a car to be taken to other portions of the company's road were all within the provisions of the act in question; and the court said: 'In this case the plaintiff was injured while on a car assisting in loading timbers to be transported over the defendant's road to some other point. The mere fact that the plaintiff's regular employment was as a bridge carpenter does not affect the case, nor does it matter that the road was newly constructed, nor whether it was in regular operation or not. The injury happened to the plaintiff while he was engaged in labor directly connected with the operation of the road, and the statute applies even though it should be given the construction counsel places on it.'"

In 1893 the legislature of Indiana enacted an employers' liability statute (sec. 7083, Burns' Ann. St., 1901), which provided that every railroad or other corporation, except municipal, operating in that State should be liable for damages for personal injury suffered by any employee while in its service, the employee so engaged being in the exercise of due care and diligence in the cases enumerated in the statute.

In So. Ind. Ry. Co. v. Harrell (68 N. E., 262), the railway company was engaged in the construction of a railroad bridge over White River. A heavy stone was being lifted by a derrick. Three of Harrell's colaborers were holding the stone away from the railroad track by means of a rope after the stone was raised above the course on which it rested. Two of the men let go the rope, and the third, being unable to hold the stone by himself, also abandoned the rope and sought a place of safety. The boom then swung around, and the chain which held the suspended stone caught on the running board of the pile driver. This caused the stone to swing east, and as it swung back it struck appellee, crushing one of his feet and injuring the other. He sought a recovery under the Indiana statute, but the supreme court of that State held that as to him the statute was no broader than the common law, and that he was not entitled to recover either by virtue of the statute or the common law.

In I. & G. R. Co. v. Foreman (69 N. E., 669), the plaintiff, an employee of the railroad company, engaged in the construction of a track, was injured while being transported to his home in the work car of the company, by reason of the negligence of the employees of another train, whereby there was a collision between that train and the work train. The court denied Foreman a right to recover, either under the Indiana statute or at common law, for the reason that he was injured by the negligence of a fellow-servant.

In P., C., C. and St. L. Rwy. Co. v. Lightheiser (78 N. E., 1033), in affirming a judgment recovered by an engineer under the statute, and in discussing the former decisions of the court construing the statute of that State, the supreme court of Indiana said of them:

"The classification of railroads by themselves was held proper in the cases above cited on account of the dangerous and hazardous character of the business of operating the railroads. This classification is based, not on the difference in employers, but upon a difference in the nature of the employment. (Indianapolis, etc., Rwy. Co. v. Houlihan, 157 Ind., 494, 501; 60 N. E., 943; 54 L. R. A., 787.) * * * Under the decisions cited the character of the employers is not a controlling factor. The statute is to be given at least a reasonable interpretation, one that will carry into effect the legislative intent. As we have shown, the basis of the classification of railroads by themselves was the hazardous and dangerous character of the employment of operating railroads, and this does not depend upon whether railroads are operated by corporations or by one or more persons. * * * The spirit and purpose of the statute must be looked to in interpreting the statute in controversy. As we have seen, the spirit and purpose of the employers' liability act of this State, so far as railroads are concerned, was the protection of employees engaged in the dangerous and hazardous work of operating railroads in this State, and we hold that it applies to every corporation, company, copartnership, or person engaged in the dangerous and hazardous business of operating a railroad, and their employees who are engaged in such dangerous and hazardous work."

In Bedford Quarries Co. v. Bough (80 N. E., 529), decided March 1, 1907, the court held that the statute, in so far as it applied to other corporations than railroad companies, violated the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States, as imposing on corporate employers burdens not imposed on individuals and partnerships. Bough was an employee of a quarry company, and was embraced by the terms of the statute. During the course of the opinion the court used this language:

"It is urged by appellant that said employers' liability act, except as applied to railroads, is in violation of the fourteenth amendment of the Constitution of the United States, and therefore void, for the reason that it imposes burdens upon private corporation employers that are not imposed on individuals and copartnerships employers in the same business, under the same circumstances and conditions, and gives a right of action to the employees of private corporations that is not granted to the employees of individuals and corporations under like conditions. Appellee insists that the legislature has the power of classification for legislative purposes, and that the classification in said act was proper. The legislature may make a classification for legislative purposes, but it must have some reasonable basis upon which to stand. It is evident that differences which would serve for classification for some purposes would furnish no reason for a classification for legislative purposes. Such legislation must not only operate equally upon all within the class, but the classification must furnish a reason for and justify the making of the class—that is, the reason for the classification must inhere in the subject-matter and rest upon some reason which is natural and substantial and not artificial. Not only must the classification treat all brought under its influence alike, under the same conditions, but it must embrace all of the class to which it is naturally related. Neither mere isolation nor mere arbitrary selection is proper classification."

And again:

"While the employers' liability act, so far as it affects private corporations, applies to all within the class named therein, it does not include all of the class to which it is naturally related. Employees of individuals and copartnerships are excluded from the benefit of its provisions. It gives a right of action to an employee for injuries received while in the service of a private corporation in certain cases, but denies the employee of an individual or copartnership engaged in the same business a right of action for an injury arising from the same cause and under the same conditions. It imposes new burdens on private corporations, while natural persons carrying on a like business and under like circumstances and conditions are left without any such burden. The right of action is made to depend upon the character of the employer, and not upon the character of the employment."

The opinion goes on to quote from Ballard v. Miss. Oil Co. (81 Miss., 507; 34 So., 533; 95 Am. St. Rep., 476; 62 L. R. A., 407), and which decided that a similar statute of Mississippi was unconstitutional, quoted the Minnesota statute, and from the Lavallee, Johnson, Kline, and Jemming cases, supra; the Iowa statute; and from the Akeson case, supra; the Lightheiser case, and Tullis v. L. E. and W. R. Co. (175 U. S., 348; Connelly v. Union Sewer Pipe Company (184 U. S., 540, supra), and then used this language:

"In view of this everyone must realize that there is a reasonable ground for the essential idea of the employers' liability legislation; but the fact must not be forgotten that the small industry still exists, and that under the convenient form of corporate capacity men still carry on industrial undertakings which are in no essential particular different from those which are carried on by copartnerships and individuals. It is this fact which makes a classification on the basis of the character of the employer inherently vicious. True, the corporation under our laws and industrial system has in it the seeds of tremendous growth, but as the real evil can be reached by a classification which goes to those elements which to some extent have removed the reason for the coservant rule, there is not even a color of an excuse for imposing burdens on the corporate employer, while its competitor, a natural person, who is carrying on under the same conditions like business, is left without any such burden. If said corporations as such are to have legislative burdens put upon them, as by the law in controversy, then all who ought to be put in their class should be included; or if this appears to the legislative mind as improper owing to differences in the character of employments, then legislation should have for its basis a classification which rests on such differences in the various employments as would make a distinction between them appear to be warranted."

In the Tullis case (175 U. S., 348), while it does not appear from the opinion of the Supreme Court that Tullis was engaged in an extrahazardous branch of railroad service, it does appear in the report of the case as decided by the United States circuit court of appeals for the seventh circuit (105 Fed., 554) that Tullis was employed as a freight-train brakeman, and was injured while so employed and while riding in the cupola of a caboose, and that he was injured by the negligence of the engineer of a pusher engine which was to push Tullis's train over a steep part of the railroad and which engine so violently collided with the caboose as to throw it from the track.

In P. C. C. and St. L. R. Co. v. Montgomery (152 Ind., 1), referred to in the opinion of the Supreme Court in the Tullis case, the injured employee was a freight brakeman, and was injured while making a coupling between two cars by the negligence of the engineer in reversing his engine without a signal. Therefore there is nothing in the Tullis case, nor in the Montgomery case, the construction of the Indiana statute in which latter case was accepted by the Supreme Court of the United States in the Tullis case, in conflict with our contention that it has been definitely decided by the supreme court of Indiana that in order to be constitutionally applied the statute must be limited to those railroad employments which are extrahazardous—the right of action must be made to depend upon the character of the employment and not upon the character of the employer.

Under these authorities there can be no question as to the construction this act would receive if it were passed by a State legislature.

If, under such circumstances, it was to be held to necessarily include risks other than extrahazardous, it would clearly be unconstitutional. As to Federal legislation, this bill raises the extremely important and interesting question as to whether Congress is subject to the same constitutional limitations and restrictions as are the States in legislating upon this and cognate questions. That it is not in terms is quite clear. The fifth amendment of the Constitution, so far as applicable, provides:

> No person shall be * * * deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law; and the fourteenth, so far as applicable, provides:

> nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law; nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws.

The fifth amendment is well understood to be applicable only to the Federal Government. That the proposed legislation, unless confined either by legislative language or judicial construction to the extrahazardous part of the commerce, would be a denial of the equal protection of the law, is clear. Whether, at the same time, the carrier would, by reason of such denial of equal protection of the law, be deprived of "property without due process of law," it must be admitted is not so clear. Does the citizen get the benefit of due process of law under the fifth amendment when he is deprived of the equal protection of the law? The most obvious suggestion that occurs with reference to these two constitutional provisions is that, inasmuch as the language of the fifth and the fourteenth amendments is identical in this respect, until the equal-protection clause is reached, evidently the authors of the fourteenth amendment, believing that under the "due process of law" clause equal protection was not guaranteed, found it necessary to add the specific clause guaranteeing it so far as the States are concerned. It is clear that if this clause was necessary to guarantee that result, then "due process of law" does not include the equal protection of the law, and if it was not necessary, the addition of the clause relative to due protection of the law would be entirely unnecessary and mere rhetoric—a conclusion that would not be hastily assumed.

That legislation depriving citizens of the equal protection of the law would be in violation of the fundamental principles of natural justice is clear. Just how far considerations of that kind can be utilized and relied upon in aid of specific constitutional limitations by the courts in determining whether the legislature has exceeded its power is a matter of doubt, and has been the subject of a great deal of interesting discussion by the courts. The books are full of expressions along those lines. For instance, Mr. Justice Jackson, of the supreme court of Massachusetts, in determining the validity of an act of the Massachusetts legislature, said, among other things:

It is manifestly contrary to the first principles of civil liberty and natural justice and of the spirit of our Constitution and laws that any one citizen should enjoy privileges and advantages which are denied to all others under like circumstances, or that anyone should be subjected to losses, damages, suits, or actions from which all others, under like circumstances, are exempted. (Holden v. James, 11 Mass., 404.)

Just how far the Supreme Court of the United States would go in applying the "due process of law" clause of the fifth amendment in connection with fundamental principles of natural justice it is impossible to say. We have not been able to make a sufficiently extensive and exhaustive investigation of the authorities to justify us in stating definitely how far, in our opinion, the court will go in construing this clause, but there can be no question but that if the court applies the construction to this clause or to the provisions of the Constitution generally that is in accordance with the great first principles of the social compact, though perhaps beyond its literal terms, this legislation would be held beyond the power of Congress, unless confined to the extrahazardous features of the employment.

In any event, it is very clear that there can be no moral justification for the enactment by the Congress of any legislation that denies to the citizen the equal protection of the law. Certainly what a State is expressly prohibited from doing as a violation of natural justice it would, from a moral standpoint, be highly improper for the Congress to do, though not expressly prohibited. In this connection it is proper to call attention to the fact that the court has expressly left this interesting question for future determination. In the opinion in the Howard case they say:

We deem it unnecessary to pass upon the merits of the contentions concerning the alleged repugnancy of the statute, if regarded as otherwise valid, to the due process clause of the fifth amendment to the Constitution, because the act classifies together all common carriers. Although we deem it unnecessary to consider that subject, it must not be implied that we question the correctness of previous decisions noted in the margin, wherein State statutes were held not to be repugnant to the fourteenth amendment, although they classified steam railroads in one class for the purpose of applying a rule of master and servant.

It is to be observed that the decisions referred to by the court were decisions that sustained the legislation because the court construed the legislation in question as applying only to the extrahazardous risks in the employment. So that the whole question upon this branch of the case is clearly open for judicial determination hereafter.

We suggest, in order to relieve the bill of this objection, the following amendment: Insert after the word "commerce" in line 10, page 1, section 1, the following: "in service directly connected with the operation of the road." This language is taken from an opinion of the United States Supreme Court and defines in the most concise language the extrahazardous service to which the legislation should be confined. With this amendment we are satisfied that the bill in this respect could not be attacked as being unconstitutional or in violation of fundamental natural rights.

III.

This bill is subject to the same criticism upon the strength of which the court, in the Howard case, held the statute relating to the same subject-matter unconstitutional. The Howard case held the statute under consideration in that case unconstitutional upon the express ground that it included in its general terms a regulation of interstate and State commerce and was, therefore, a regulation of both. Their conclusion was based upon two reasons, each of which is the inseparable legal concomitant of the other, because as a legal proposition it is an impossibility to increase the rights of the employee with reference to his recovery against the master without at the same time impairing the rights of the employer or imposing upon the employer an additional liability, and the court discussed their reasons from both of these points of view. They said in the first instance that the statute was unconstitutional because it was in favor of all the employees of interstate carriers who were engaged in interstate commerce, and therefore operated in favor of employees who were engaged in State commerce as well as those engaged in interstate commerce, as it is clear that the same carrier at the same time and as a part of the same operation may obviously be engaged in both interstate and State commerce, and has employees for the purpose of prosecuting the common enterprise engaged in each kind of commerce; and second, it imposed a new liability upon the carrier who was engaged in both interstate and State commerce without confining the liability of the carrier to such carriers as were engaged in interstate commerce, which alone Congress had the power to regulate, and so the court said, in the first instance:

As the word "any" is unqualified, it follows that liability to the servant is coextensive with the business done by the employers whom the statute embraces—that is, it is in favor of any of the employees of all carriers who engage in interstate commerce.

That is to say, the carrier who is engaged in interstate commerce might, at the same time, be engaged in State commerce, and would therefore have State employees as well as interstate employees, and as the language "any employees" covered all employees, however engaged, it necessarily operated in favor of State as well as interstate employees, and that was one of the concomitant factors of the whole equation making the act unconstitutional.

As to this indispensable factor in the common equation, the pending bill very properly confines the employees in whose favor it operates to such as are engaged in interstate commerce, and thus eliminates from State commerce one factor of the whole equation. Second, and as to the other indispensable factor of the common equation, imposing the new liability, the court said:

This also is the rule as to the one who otherwise would be a fellow-servant, by whose negligence the injury or death may have been occasioned, since it is provided that the right to recover on the part of any servant will exist, although the injury for which the carrier is to be held resulted from "the negligence of any of its officers, agents, or employees."

And here again the court find that the liability feature is imposed without any distinction as to whether the negligence is caused by an employee who is engaged in interstate or State commerce, and for that reason also, that being an inseparable factor of the common equation, the statute was held unconstitutional. In other words, they held that the benefits conferred and the liability imposed must both be confined to interstate commerce. Each proposition is indispensably connected with the other, and the limitation is as important in one case as in the other. You can not have one factor without the other. Because the statute in question confined neither of these inseparable concomitants to interstate commerce, the act was held unconstitutional. The bill now pending as to the liability imposed upon the employer or carrier is an exact duplicate of that part of the act that was thus held unconstitutional by the court, and is not, as that was not, confined to interstate commerce; and it must be held unconstitutional by the court unless the court reverses itself in the Howard case and holds that it will be sufficient if one of the indispensable concomitant factors of the equation is within the power, while the other factor of the same equation is outside of and beyond the power of Congress, which we do not think they either will or can do.

In this respect the bill provides for liability for "such injury or death resulting in whole or in part from the negligence of any of the officers, agents, or employees of such carrier;" and the act in this respect provided for liability "for all damages which may result from the negligence of any of its officers, agents or employees," being identical with the language used in the bill, so far as the character or class of the employees is concerned through which liability is imposed upon the carrier.

In further elaboration of this idea the court said:

The act then being addressed to all common carriers engaged in interstate commerce, and imposing a liability upon them in favor of any of their employees, without qualification or restrictions as to the business in which the carriers or their employees may be engaged at the time of the injury, of necessity includes subjects wholly outside of the power of Congress to regulate commerce.

A brief analysis of this statement of the court shows that the court said that the act imposed—a liability upon * * * carriers * * * without qualification or restriction as to the business in which the carriers * * * may be engaged at the time of the injury— and that was one of the reasons why it was unconstitutional, and that is precisely what this bill does in terms.

The court also said, presenting the other side of the equation, that the liability was—in favor of any of their employees without qualification or restriction as to the business in which * * * their employees may be engaged at the time of the injury.

In this particular as to the employee, as we have suggested, the defect has been cured by providing that the employee must, at the time of the injury, be engaged in interstate commerce, but as to the carrier, as we have already shown, no such limitation is made. The illustration sometimes used of a carrier engaged at the same time in interstate and State commerce, and having, of course, interstate and State employees, with an injury to an interstate employee caused by the negligence of a coservant who was a State employee, is a conclusive demonstration of the unconstitutionality of this bill, because it attempts to regulate the relations between a master and a servant engaged in State commerce and therefore beyond the power of Congress to control. In the case suggested, without any legislation the common carrier would not be liable, for the simple and obvious reason that, although the employee injured was engaged in interstate commerce and the one doing the injury was engaged in State commerce, they would be the coservants of a common master engaged in a common enterprise, and the injured employee would have no remedy, as the carrier would not be liable for the negligence of a fellow-servant. It is proposed by this bill to make the carrier liable under such circumstances, as the carrier is made liable for the "negligence of any (that is, all) of its officers, agents, or employees," and it is too clear for argument that the carrier can not be made liable for the negligence of his employee engaged in State commerce, the coservant of his interstate-commerce employee, without changing the common-law rule and eliminating the fellow-servant limitation of liability, that in the absence of the proposed bill would relieve the carrier from liability, thus regulating State commerce.

When the bill applies, as this does, to "any employees" whose negligence cause an injury, it necessarily includes, under the rule laid down in the Howard case, State employees engaged in State commerce, which, as has been repeatedly stated and held, is beyond the power of Congress. We suggest, in order to relieve the bill of this what seems to us obvious criticism, that there be inserted after the word "carrier," in line 4, on page 2, the words, "who at the time of such negligence are engaged in interstate commerce." With the adoption of this amendment the bill, with reference to both of the indispensable factors making up the common equation, would be within the constitutional limitations laid down in the Howard case.

IV.

Inasmuch as this bill very greatly enlarges the rights of the employee and imposes new and onerous burdens upon the employer, making him practically an insurer, it seems to us that in order to prevent malingering, if this bill is to become a law, the carrier should be provided with at least reasonable facilities to enable him to adequately protect his rights, and we therefore think that the following section should be added to this bill, the justice and wisdom of which has been fully established by the report made by Mr. Bannon in the last Congress on H. R. 10, Report No. 7587, which we quote as a part of these views:

[Section.]

That in any action brought under the provisions of this act for physical injuries not resulting in death the court may, in its discretion, upon motion of the defendant, order and require the party injured, at or in advance of the trial, to submit to a personal physical examination with respect to such injuries by the physicians or surgeons of the opposite party, under such restrictions and upon such terms and conditions as may to the court seem reasonable and proper: Provided, however, That said party shall have the privilege of being represented at such examination by his own physician or surgeon and such person or persons as he may designate.

[House Report No. 7587, Fifty-ninth Congress, second session.]

The object of this section is to confer a discretionary power upon Federal courts to order the plaintiff in actions brought to recover for personal injuries sustained to submit to a personal physical examination.

The enactment of the bill is made necessary by the opinion of the court in Union Pacific Railway Company v. Botsford (141 U. S., p. 250), wherein it is held that—

"The order moved for, subjecting the plaintiff's person to examination by a surgeon, without her consent and in advance of the trial, was not according to the common law, to common usage, or to the statutes of the United States."

Under this rule the Federal courts are not vested with any discretion whatever relative to such examinations, and the defendant is left in practice to offer as a matter of evidence the demand for an examination and its refusal by the plaintiff as reflecting upon the bona fides of the plaintiff's claim as to the nature and extent of such injuries. But this denies the defendant the equal opportunity with the plaintiff of calling a medical witness as to the character of the injuries, and to that extent, at least, is an injustice.

That a majority of the adjudications in this country are not in harmony with Railway Company v. Botsford is manifest from the text found in section 202 of Underhill on Evidence (1894), reading as follows:

"SEC. 202. Physical examination of the party by experts.—The question whether the court in civil cases can compel the plaintiff to furnish evidence by submitting to a physical examination by a physician has been differently decided. The affirmative is supported by a majority of the cases, which maintain that the courts have an inherent power to do this, basing their reasoning upon the necessity for the inspection, though there are other cases sustaining the proposition that, while such an inspection may be allowed, it can not in the absence of a statute be compelled."

The following States hold that the court may order reasonable physical examination of the plaintiff to be made before trial by competent physicians and surgeons when such an examination is necessary to ascertain the nature, extent, or permanency of the injuries:

Alabama: Railroad Co. v. Hill (90 Ala., 71).
Arkansas: Sibley v. Smith (46 Ark., 275).
Arkansas: Railroad Co. v. Dobbins (60 Ark., 481).
Georgia: Railroad Co. v. Childress (82 Ga., 719).
Iowa: Schroeder v. Railroad Co. (47 Iowa, 375).
Kansas: Ottawa v. Gilliland (63 Kans., 165).
Kentucky: Belt Line Co. v. Allen (102 Ky., 551).
Minnesota: Wanek v. Winona (78 Minn., 98).
Missouri: Owens v. Railroad Co. (95 Mo., 169).
Ohio: Turnpike Co. v. Baily (37 O. S., 104).
Pennsylvania: Demenstein v. Richardson (2 Pa., Dist., 825).
Washington: Lane v. Spokane Falls (21 Wash., 118).
Wisconsin: White v. Railroad Co. (61 Wis., 336).

The following States hold that in the absence of a statute there is no such power:

Illinois: Railroad Co. v. Call (143 Ill., 177).
Indiana: Pennsylvania Co. v. Newmeyer (129 Ind., 401).
Massachusetts: Stack v. Railroad Co. (177 Mass., 155).
New York: McQuigan v. Railroad Co. (129 N. Y., 50).
South Carolina: Easter v. Railroad Co. (60 S. C., 177).
Texas: Railroad Co. v. Kluck (73 S. W., 569).

The States of New York and New Jersey now have statutes similar to H. R. 10, and they have been declared to be constitutional:

Lyon v. Railroad Co. (142 N. Y., 298).
Mr. Govern v. Hope (N. J. L., 76).

In Camden and Suburban Railway Company v. Stetson (177 U. S., p. 172) the New Jersey statute was considered by the court in its answer to the following question:

"Had the circuit court the legal right or power to order a surgical examination of the plaintiff?"

The New Jersey statute confers such power, and the question was whether that statute would be enforced in the Federal courts or not. The answer certified by the court was in the affirmative, thus indicating that the court in the Botsford case did not disapprove of the delegation of such power to the judiciary, but only held that legislation was necessary in order to confer the right. The syllabus in the Stetson case is as follows:

"This was an action brought in the circuit court of the United States for the district of New Jersey against a railway company, for an alleged injury to the plaintiff caused by the neglect of the railway company while the plaintiff was a passenger on one of its cars. Held, That that court had the legal right or power under the statute of New Jersey and the United States Revised Statutes to order a surgical examination of the plaintiff."

Section 721 of the United States Revised Statutes (sec. 34 of the judiciary act) was held in Boyce v. Tabb (85 U. S., p. 546) not to apply to questions of a general nature not based on a local statute or usage; and in Railway Company v. Botsford, in discussing the inherent power to order an examination, the court says, at page 256:

"But this is not a question which is governed by the law or practice of the State in which the trial is had."

Consequently, in the absence of a State statute in those jurisdictions where the courts hold a statute is unnecessary, because the power exists without it, the Federal courts therein follow one rule and the State courts another.

The most recent and exhaustive discussion of this subject is found in Wigmore on Evidence (1904), volume 3, section 2220, in which the case of Railroad Company v. Botsford is thoroughly discussed by the author. In speaking of the privilege of exemption from examination it is there said in part:

"It has remained for such privilege to be claimed, and in a few jurisdictions to be acknowledged, in a class of cases in which, above all, there is most detriment and least service in its existence, namely, actions for corporal injuries. Why should all analogies fail here, and exemption be accorded to a plaintiff seeking to conceal from the tribunal the true nature and extent of his injuries? * * *

"There is and will be no end to the variety of frauds invented, and it will be an ill day for justice when the courts cease to meet new frauds by new applications of old remedies. Quite apart from the general impolicy of granting to a party the license to conceal truth by any form of refusal, there is, in this class of cases, the added consideration that corporal injuries are to-day notoriously a subject of frequent fraud and misrepresentation, so that the privilege to withhold the exhibition of the alleged injury may amount in such cases to nothing less than a judicial license for fraud.

"These considerations, together with the absurdity of a judicial declaration that a court lacks the power to control those who seek for their fraud the very aid of the law itself, have weighed emphatically with most of our courts. * * *

"Under some such limitations as these the compulsory exhibition of the party's body will now be ordered in the greater number of jurisdictions. Had it not been for the singular notions of judicial impotence early advanced in New York, and the prestige of the court whose majority pronounced the opinion in United States v. Botsford, there would perhaps to-day have been a unanimous concurrence in this doctrine."

In view of the greater weight of authority and the fact that the court pointed out the absence of a statute and the belief on the part of the committee that the judiciary may be relied upon to exercise its discretion wisely and to prevent improper shock to the modesty or feelings or delicacy of an injured party, this bill is recommended for passage as amended.

While there are other features of this bill that are subject to criticism both as to principle and detail, we have decided in these views to point out only the salient and fundamental legal objections thereto which we think ought to prevail.

C. E. LITTLEFIELD.
HENRY T. BANNON.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Now, Mr. Speaker, in order to raise this precise question presented by the second question raised by the minority views, I ask unanimous consent to now offer, and have considered as pending, the following amendment, in order that it may appear on the RECORD that this question was specifically called to the attention of the House before it passed the legislation.

Mr. STERLING. I object, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I ask unanimous consent to offer and have pending for that purpose, first, this amendment——

Mr. STERLING. I object.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Can I not state the amendment? I will state it in my own time. It is as follows:

Insert after the word "commerce," in line 10, page 1, section 1, the words "in service directly connected with the operation of the road."

I understand that is objected to.

Mr. STERLING. I object.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. And I further ask unanimous consent for the same reason, so that it may appear that the question was specifically presented to the House, to amend by inserting after the word "carrier," in line 4, page 2, the words:

Who, at the time of such negligence, are engaged in interstate commerce.

Mr. STERLING. I object.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Very well. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has two minutes.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I will reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. Speaker, I now yield two minutes to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. REID].

Mr. REID. I yield my time, Mr. Speaker, to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, this side of the House, the country knows, is emphatically in favor of the passage of this bill. We welcome the opportunity to illustrate to the country how quickly and how rapidly we can join in passing genuine remedial legislation. [Applause on the Democratic side.] We will be glad to be furnished with more like it and to repeat the illustration as each remedial bill is furnished to the House. I predict that if there be any opposition to this bill at all it will be upon the Republican side of this Chamber.

Mr. Speaker, this is the first encouragement in some time that the Democratic party has had, and it leads me to read an extract from a newspaper headed "An encouraging revolt."

AN ENCOURAGING REVOLT.

It is a long time since the Democrats in the House have shown the fighting spirit manifested Thursday and yesterday under the leadership of JOHN SHARP WILLIAMS.

They have fallen into the habit of submitting tamely to the fatuous domination of CANNON, PAYNE, and DALZELL. There is little courage or independence on the Republican side. It is too well drilled to subservience. So long as its members disregard conscience and honor and vote solidly, as they did Thursday, against all proposals to consider the repeal of wood-pulp and paper duties and other sound recommendations of President Roosevelt in order to gratify the little clique——

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Well, I have got to a good stopping place; everybody knows who the "little clique" is. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. STERLING. Mr. Chairman, I now yield three minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE].

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, to illustrate the tactics of the other side, they have delayed the consideration of this bill for half an hour this morning by calling the roll on the approval of the Journal at the demand of the gentleman from Mississippi, which approval he voted for after it had been carried by a viva voce vote. Mr. Speaker, he seems to think that he will make the country believe—because every time he says something he says, "I say this to the House and to the country"—he seems to think that he will make the country believe that the way to facilitate legislation is by a useless demand for a roll call, and so delay the House in performing its functions in passing the supply bills that must be passed.

Why, Mr. Speaker, he has not had anything more to do with bringing about the report from this committee and the consideration of this bill than the boy in the street. It has been the settled purpose of this side of the House and the members of the Judiciary Committee of the whole majority to bring this matter before Congress in order that legislation might be passed. [Applause on the Republican side.] If there is opposition on this side of the House it is because one or two Members believe that the bill is unconstitutional, and may be decided so, as the former bill was. When the former bill was before the House I said to gentlemen around me that I feared it was unconstitutional, but it meets the approbation of the counsel for the locomotive engineers, and therefore I voted for it. I say to-day that I fear this bill may receive the same decision from the Supreme Court of the United States when it gets there, but I shall vote to-day as I voted a year and a half ago in favor of passing an employers' liability act. And, gentlemen, we will go on with the legislation of this country, and the majority will decide in their own good time and despite any let or hindrance from the gentleman from Mississippi and his voting trust, which it is reported he had organized on that side last Saturday to stand by him in every obstructive method to stop legislation; notwithstanding that, we will go on and write on the statute book just what we on this side of the House desire. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. STERLING. Mr. Speaker, I will now yield two minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. CLAYTON].

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, this bill comes from the Committee on the Judiciary with a dissent on the part of three members of that committee. I may call the attention of the House to the fact, because if I call the attention of the country to the fact it might offend our worthy friend from New York. [Laughter on the Democratic side.] I call the attention of the House to the fact that that committee is composed of seventeen members; that six Democrats, if they had joined with the three dissenting Republicans, would have reported adversely on this measure. [Applause on the Democratic side.] So that if this legislation is enacted its favorable report to this House is due to the courage, the patriotism, and the far-sightedness of the Democratic members of the Judiciary Committee. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

I am glad that the gentleman from Maine [Mr. LITTLEFIELD] has printed the minority views of himself and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BANNON], and I hope that he will also have printed in the RECORD the minority views of the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PARKER], the other Republican member of the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLAYTON. I have not the time; I can not. I will ask that the gentleman's views be printed in the RECORD. I want them in there. I have not read them; have not had the time. The gentleman writes excellently, always from a Republican standpoint, and I ask that they be printed, not with my indorsement, but to show up the absurdity of the Republican position; and, Mr. Speaker, I ask that the views of the majority, beginning on page 1 of the report, down to and including the words "railroad company, et al.," on page 9, be printed in the RECORD as a part of my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. CLAYTON. Now, Mr. Speaker, in order to expedite this measure, I hope my time has expired and that we can vote immediately. [Laughter and applause.]

The views of the majority are as follows:

The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred House bill 20310, have had the same under consideration, and report it to the House with a recommendation that it pass.

This bill relates to common carriers by railroad engaged in interstate and foreign commerce and in commerce in the District of Columbia, the Territories, the Canal Zone, and other possessions of the United States. It is intended in its scope to cover all commerce to which the regulative power of Congress extends.

The purpose of this bill is to change the common-law liability of employers of labor in this line of commerce, for personal injuries received by employees in the service. It abolishes the strict common-law rule of liability which bars a recovery for the personal injury or death of an employee, occasioned by the negligence of a fellow-servant. It also relaxes the common-law rule which makes contributory negligence a defense to claims for such injuries. It permits a recovery by an employee for an injury caused by the negligence of a coemployee; nor is such a recovery barred even though the injured one contributed by his own negligence to the injury. The amount of the recovery, however, is diminished in the same degree that the negligence of the injured one contributed to the injury. It makes each party responsible for his own negligence, and requires each to bear the burden thereof. The bill also provides that, to the extent that any contract, rule, or regulation seeks to exempt the employer from liability created by this act, to that extent such contract, rule, or regulation shall be void.

Many of the States have already changed the common-law rule in these particulars, and by this bill it is hoped to fix a uniform rule of liability throughout the Union with reference to the liability of common carriers to their employees.

Sections 1 and 2 of this bill provide that common carriers by railroad, engaged in interstate and foreign commerce, in commerce in the District of Columbia, the Territories, the Panama Canal Zone, and other possessions of the United States, shall be liable to its employees for personal injuries resulting from its negligence or by reason of any defect or insufficiency due to its negligence in its roads, equipment, or methods. It is not a new departure, but rather goes back to the old law which made the master liable for injury occasioned by the negligence of his servant, either to a coservant or to a third person.

The doctrine of fellow-servant was first enunciated in England in 1837, and since that time it has been generally followed in that country and this, except where abrogated or modified by statute. Whatever reason may have existed for the doctrine at the time it was first announced, it can not be said to exist now, under modern methods of commerce by railroad. It is possible that a century ago, under industrial methods and systems as they then existed, coemployees could have some influence over each other tending to their personal safety. It is possible that they could know something of the habits and characteristics of each other. Under present industrial methods and systems this can not be true. Then they worked with simple tools and were closely associated with each other in their work. Now they work with powerful and complex machinery, with widely diversified duties, and are distributed over larger areas and often widely separated from each other.

Under present methods, personal injuries have become a prodigious burden to the employees engaged in our industrial and commercial systems.

The master should be made wholly responsible for injury to the servant by reason of the negligence of a coservant. He exercises the authority of choosing the employees, and if made responsible for their acts while in line of duty he will be induced to exercise the highest degree of care in selecting competent and careful persons and will feel bound at all times to exercise over employees an authority and influence which will compel the highest degree of care on their part for the safety of each other in the performance of their duties.

These sections make the employer liable for injury caused by defects or insufficiencies in the roadbed, tracks, engines, machinery, and other appliances used in the operation of railroads. Over these things the employee has absolutely no authority. The employer has complete authority over them, both in their construction and in their maintenance. It is a very hard rule, indeed, to compel men, who by the exigencies and necessities of life are bound to labor, to assume the risks and hazards of the employment, when these risks and hazards could be greatly lessened by the exercise of proper care on the part of the employer in providing safe and proper machinery and equipment with which the employee does his work. We believe that a strict rule of liability of the employer to the employee for injuries received by defective machinery will greatly lessen personal injuries on that account. The common-law rules of fellow-servants and assumption of risk still prevail in many of the States, and without any apparent good reason. In recent years many of the countries of Europe have adopted new rules of liability, which greatly relieve the harshness of the common law as it still exists in some of the States.

In 1888 England passed an act which abolished the doctrine of fellow-servant with reference to the operation of railroad trains, and in 1897 it extended this law to apply to many of the hazardous employments of the country.

For many years the doctrine in Germany has been yielding step by step to better rules, until for the last quarter of a century it does not apply to any of the hazardous occupations.

In 1869 Austria passed a law making railroad companies liable for all injuries to their employees except where the injury was due to the victim's own negligence.

The Code Napoleon made the employer answerable for all injuries received by his workmen, and this code is still in force in Belgium and Holland.

Other European countries have from time to time made laws fixing the liability of the master for damages caused by the negligent act of his servant.

Many of the States have passed laws modifying the doctrine as changing conditions required it and justice to the employee demanded it.

Alabama in 1885 eliminated the doctrine so far as it relates to railroads, and in other particulars.

Arkansas in 1893 qualified the doctrine as to railroad employment.

Georgia in 1856 entirely abolished the doctrine as to railroads.

Iowa abolished it as to train operatives in 1862.

Kansas did the same thing in 1874.

The latest statute in Wisconsin on the subject abolished the fellow-servant doctrine as to employees actually engaged in operating trains.

Minnesota did the same thing in 1887.

Florida, Ohio, Mississippi, and Texas have changed the doctrine to the advantage of the employee.

North Carolina, North Dakota, and Massachusetts have practically eliminated the doctrine as regards the operation of railroad trains.

Colorado in 1901 abolished the doctrine in toto.

Other States have either abolished or modified it as regards the operation of railroads.

As compared with the law now in force in other countries and in many of the States, the changes made in the law of fellow-servant by this bill are not radical. The doctrine as regards the hazardous occupations is being relegated everywhere.

A Federal statute of this character will supplant the numerous State statutes on the subject so far as they relate to interstate commerce. It will create uniformity throughout the Union, and the legal status of such employer's liability for personal injuries, instead of being subject to numerous rules, will be fixed by one rule in all the States.

It is thought that the adoption of the rule, as provided in this section, will be conducive to greater care in the operation of railroads. As it is now, where the doctrine of fellow-servant is in force, no one is responsible for the injury or death of an employee if caused by the carelessness of a coemployee. The coservant who is guilty of negligence resulting in the injury may be liable, but as a rule he is not responsible, and hence the injury is not compensated. The employee is not held by the employer to such strict rules of caution for the safety of his coemployee, because the employer is not bound to pay the damages in case of injury. If he were held liable for damages for every injury occasioned by the negligence of his servant, he would impose the same strict rules for the safety of his employees as he does for the safety of passengers and strangers. He will make the employment of his servant and his retention in the service dependent upon the exercise of higher care, and this will be the stronger inducement to the employee to act with a higher regard for the safety of his fellow-workmen.

Section 3 is a modification of the common-law rule of contributory negligence. It does not abolish the law. Under its provisions contributory negligence still bars a recovery for personal injury so far as the injury is due to the contributory negligence of the employee, but entitles the employee to recover for the injury so far as it is due to the negligence of the employer. It differs from the act passed by Congress in June, 1906, on this point, in this: That law provided that contributory negligence did not bar a recovery if the negligence of the employee was slight and that of the employer was gross in comparison. That law modified the common-law rule of contributory negligence and also contained a modification of the common-law doctrine of comparative negligence. We are unable to see any justification whatever in the common-law doctrine of comparative negligence anywhere. It is the only rule of negligence that permits an employee to recover damages for injury to which his own negligence contributed. Comparative negligence is absolutely wrong in principle, for the reason that it permits the employee to recover full damages for injury, even though his own negligence contributed to it. It is true, as the law states it, he can only recover damages when his contributory negligence is slight and that of the employer is gross in comparison. But that rule does not undertake to diminish the verdict in proportion to the negligence of the employee. This may be said in behalf of the doctrine of contributory negligence in its common-law purity, and it is the only reason, so far as we know, that has ever been assigned for its existence: It tends to make the employee exercise a higher degree of care for his own safety.

If that is a good reason for the existence of that rule, then we believe that section 3 of this bill is a very great improvement on that doctrine, for the reason that it imposes the burden of the employer's negligence on the employer, and he will thus be induced to exercise higher care in the selection of his employees, and in other ways, for the safety of persons in his employment. If the law imposes on the employee the burden of his own negligence, that is certainly sufficient, and that is what this section seeks to do, and it also seeks to impose upon the employer the burden of his negligence. It provides that contributory negligence shall not bar a recovery for injury due to the negligence of the employer. It provides that the jury shall diminish the damages suffered by the injured employee in proportion to the amount of negligence attributable to such employee.

It is urged by some that such a provision is impracticable of administration and that juries will not divide the damages in accordance with the negligence committed by each. The same objection can be urged against the provision of the bill passed by Congress in 1906, which provided that only slight negligence should not bar a recovery, but that the jury should diminish damages in proportion to such slight negligence. Under that provision the jury would have the same difficulty, if any, in apportioning the damages according to the negligence of each party. We submit, further, that this section of the bill is free from the very unjust principle contained in the common-law doctrine of comparative negligence which allowed the employee to recover full damages for injury to which his own negligence contributed in some degree. It is not a just criticism of a law, conceding the righteousness of its principles, to say that it is impracticable of administration. We submit that the principle in this section is ideal justice, against which no fair argument can be made. It is better that legislatures pass just and fair laws, even though they may be difficult of administration by the courts, rather than to pass unjust and unfair laws because they may be more easily administered by the courts. Courts ought not to be compelled to administer the common-law doctrine of contributory negligence, which puts upon the employee the whole burden of negligence, even though his negligence was slight and that of the employer was gross. That law might to some extent induce higher care on the part of the employee, but in the same degree, and for the same reason, it induces the employer to have less regard and less care for the safety of his employees.

It is urged that juries under this law will wholly ignore the negligence committed by the employee and charge all the injury to the negligence of the employer. We do not believe that this will be the result of the administration of this section. We believe it will appeal to juries as eminently just and they will undertake to enforce it literally to the best of their skill. If juries under the common-law rule of contributory negligence have been disposed to assess damages in spite of the fact that the defendant contributed to the injury by his own negligence, it may be said that the jury recognizes the injustice of the law and undertakes to correct it by what they consider a just and righteous verdict. There is nothing in this law that will induce such a sentiment in the minds of the jury, but it will appeal to them as the true principle, and, in our judgment, they will seek to apply it fairly in the courts.

Beach, in his work on Contributory Negligence, page 136, comments on the law as provided in this section as follows:

"Much may be said in favor of the rule which counts the plaintiff's negligence in mitigation of the damages in those cases which frequently arise, wherein, on one hand, a real injury has been suffered by the plaintiff by reason of the culpable negligence of the defendant, and yet, where, on the other hand, the plaintiff's conduct was such as to some extent contribute to the injury, but in so small a degree that to impose upon him the entire loss seems not to take a just account of the defendant's negligence. In those cases, which may be denominated 'hard cases,' the Georgia and Tennessee rule in mitigation of damages without necessarily sacrificing the principle upon which the law as to contributory negligence rests is a rule against which, in respect of justice and humanity, nothing can be said. Where the severity of the general rule might refuse the plaintiff any remedy whatever, as the sheer injustice of the rule, as laid down in Davis v. Mann, would impose the whole liability upon the defendant, it is quite possible to conceive a case where the application of the rule which mitigates the damages in proportion to the plaintiff's misconduct, but does not decline to impose them at all, would work substantial justice between the parties."

Shearman and Redfield on the Law of Negligence, fifth edition, page 158, in speaking of this rule, say:

"This is substantially an adoption of the admiralty rule, which is certainly nearer ideal justice, if juries could be trusted to act upon it."

The United States has adhered much closer to the common-law doctrine of contributory negligence than the leading countries of Europe. The laws of England, Germany, and Italy go much further to discharge the employee from the responsibility of his own act than does the common-law doctrine of comparative negligence.

The laws of France, Switzerland, and Russia are in practical accord with the provisions of section 3 of this bill.

The rule provided for in this section is recognized to some extent in this country. Maryland and some of the other States have passed statutes seeking to divide the responsibility where both parties are guilty of negligence.

The provisions of this section are certainly just. What can be more fair than that each party shall suffer the consequences of his own carelessness? It certainly appeals more strongly to the fair mind than the proposition that the employee shall have no redress whatever, even though his injury is due mainly to the negligence of another. As a consequence of this legislation, we believe there will be fewer accidents. By the responsibility imposed, both parties will be induced to the exercise of greater diligence, and as a result the public will travel and property will be transported in greater safety.

The proviso in section 3 is to the effect that contributory negligence shall not be charged to the employee if he is injured or killed by reason of the violation, by the employer, of any statute enacted for the safety of employees. The effect of the provision is to make a violation of such a statute negligence per se on the part of the employer. The courts of some States have held this as a principle of the common law. Other States have enacted it into statute.

Section 4 provides, in effect, that the employee shall not be charged with the assumption of risk in case he is injured by reason of the violation by the employer of a statute enacted for the safety of employees. This section likewise makes the violation of such a statute negligence per se on the part of the employer, and is already the law in many of the States of the Union.

Section 5 renders void any contract or rule whereby a common carrier seeks to exempt itself from liability created by this act. Many of the States have enacted laws making void such contracts and regulations, and, so far as we are informed, these statutes have been sustained by the courts. The following States have incorporated into their statutes language similar to the language contained in this bill on this question: Arkansas, California, Colorado, Florida, Georgia, Indiana, Iowa, Massachusetts, Minnesota, Mississippi, Montana, Nebraska, Nevada, New York, North Carolina, North Dakota, Ohio, Oregon, South Carolina, South Dakota, Texas, Virginia, Wisconsin, and Wyoming. The supreme court of Ohio held that a contract exempting a railroad company from liability for injuries was void under the common law as against public safety. Likewise the supreme court of Arkansas and the court of appeals of Virginia have held the same doctrine. The courts of New York have held that such contracts, though based on a consideration, are void as against public policy. The statutes of Ohio and Iowa fixing the liability of employer to employees, containing provisions similar to this section, have been held constitutional by the Federal courts, although the cases in which these decisions were rendered did not expressly turn on that question. The courts of Alabama have held such contracts void, regardless of statute. In Georgia and Pennsylvania such contracts have been held valid, but since the decision in Georgia that State has adopted a statute making them void.

This provision is necessary in order to make effective sections 1 and 2 of the bill. Some of the railroads of the country insist on a contract with their employees discharging the company from liability for personal injuries.

In any event, the employees of many of the common carriers of the country are to-day working under a contract of employment which by its terms releases the company from liability for damages arising out of the negligence of other employees. As an illustration we quote one paragraph from a blank form of application for a situation with the American Express Company, and entitled "Rules governing employment by this company:"

"I do further agree, in consideration of my employment by said American Express Company, that I will assume all risks of accident or injury which I shall meet with or sustain in the course of such employment, whether occasioned by the negligence of said company or any of its members, officers, agents, or employees, or otherwise; and that in case I shall at any time suffer any such injury, I will at once execute and deliver to said company a good and sufficient release, under my hand and seal, of all claims, demands, and causes of action arising out of such injury or connected therewith or resulting therefrom; and I hereby bind myself, my heirs, executors, and administrators, with the payment to said express company, on demand, of any sum which it may be compelled to pay in consequence of any such claim or in defending the same, including all counsel fees and expenses of litigation connected therewith."

While many of the States have enacted statutes making such contracts void, yet the United States Supreme Court, there being no Federal statute on the subject, have held a similar contract valid in the case of Voigt v. Baltimore and Ohio Southwestern Railroad (176 U. S., p. 498). In this case the railroad company entered into a contract with an express company whereby it agreed to carry the business of the express company, to furnish it with cars and certain facilities over its road, and to carry its messengers, in consideration of which the express company agreed to save harmless the railroad company from all claim for damages for personal injury received by its employees, whether the injuries were caused by the negligence of the railroad company or otherwise.

Voigt entered the service of the express company as messenger, and by the contract of his employment he agreed to assume all the risk of accident and injury and to indemnify and save harmless the express company from all claims that might be made against it for injury he might suffer, whether resulting from negligence or otherwise, and to execute a release for the same.

Voigt was injured and sued. The court said:

"He was not constrained to enter into the contract whereby the railroad company was exonerated from liability to him, but entered into the same freely and voluntarily, and obtained the benefit of it by securing his appointment as such messenger, and that such a contract did not contravene public policy."

In the case of O'Brien v. C. and N. W. Ry. Co. (Fed. Rep., vol. 116, p. 502), which involved the statute of Iowa making such contracts invalid, the court said:

"That while such contracts would be effective to protect the railroad company from liability at common law, under such statutory provisions declaratory of the public policy of the State they were invalid and constituted no defense to an action against it for the death of the messenger occurring in the State of Iowa by reason of the wrecking of the express car in which he was employed, through the negligence and want of ordinary care of defendant or its servants, whether the messenger be regarded as an employee of the defendant or not."

This section of the bill, however, provides that the common carrier may set off against any claim for damages whatever it has contributed toward such insurance, relief benefit, or indemnity that may have been paid to the injured employee, which would seem to be entirely fair and all that ought to be required of the employee.

Some of the roads of the country have established what are called "relief departments," which seek to operate a species of insurances for the employee against the hazards of the employment, but, so far as we know, all their forms of contracts, used by these relief departments to insure the employee, discharge the company from every possible liability for personal injuries to the employee. This release is made by its terms of agreement in consideration of the contributions of the company to the relief fund.

The following is one of the paragraphs from the form of application for membership in the relief department used by the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company:

"I further agree that, in consideration of the contributions of said company to the relief department and of the guaranty by it of the payment of the benefits aforesaid, the acceptance of benefits from such relief feature for the injury or death shall operate as a release of all claims against said company, or any company owning or operating its branches or divisions, or any company over whose railroad, right of way, or property the said Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company or any company owning or operating its branches or divisions shall have the right to run or operate its engines or cars or send its employees in the performance of their duty, for damages by reason of such injury or death which could be made by or through me; and that the superintendent may require, as a condition precedent to the payment of such benefits, that all acts by him deemed appropriate or necessary to effect the full release and discharge of the said companies from all such claims be done by those who might bring suit for damages by reason of such injury or death; and also that the bringing of such a suit by me, my beneficiary or legal representative, or for the use of my beneficiary alone or with others, or the payment by any of the companies aforesaid of damages for such injury or death recovered in any suit or determined by a compromise or any costs incurred therein, shall operate as a release in full to the relief department of all claims by reason of membership therein."

The form of application used by other companies are similar in terms to the one cited, and make acceptance of benefits from said fund a release of all claims for damages for injury or death.

By an act concerning common carriers engaged in interstate commerce and their employees, approved June 1, 1898, known as the "arbitration law," it is made a misdemeanor on the part of any employer subject to the provisions of that act—

"To require any employee or any person seeking employment, as a condition of such employment, to enter into a contract whereby such employee or applicant for employment shall agree to contribute to any fund for charitable, sociable, or beneficial purposes; to release such employer from legal liability for any personal injury by reason of any benefit received from such fund beyond the proportion of benefit arising from the employer's contribution to such fund."

The following is a copy of the bill as reported by the committee:

"[H. R. 20310, Sixtieth Congress, first session.]

"A bill relating to the liability of common carriers by railroad to their employees in certain cases.

"Be it enacted, etc., That every common carrier by railroad while engaging in commerce between any of the several States or Territories, or between any of the States and Territories, or between the District of Columbia and any of the States or Territories, or between the District of Columbia or any of the States or Territories and any foreign nation or nations, shall be liable in damages to any person suffering injury while he is employed by such carrier in such commerce, or, in case of the death of such employee, to his or her personal representative, for the benefit of the surviving widow or husband and children of such employee; and, if none, then of such employee's parents; and, if none, then of the next of kin dependent upon such employee, for such injury or death resulting in whole or in part from the negligence of any of the officers, agents, or employees of such carrier, or by reason of any defect or insufficiency, due to its negligence, in its cars, engines, appliances, machinery, track, roadbed, works, boats, wharves, or other equipment.

"SEC. 2. That every common carrier by railroad in the Territories, the District of Columbia, the Panama Canal Zone, or other possessions of the United States shall be liable in damages to any person suffering injury while he is employed by such carrier in any of said jurisdictions, or, in case of the death of such employee, to his or her personal representative, for the benefit of the surviving widow or husband and children of such employee; and, if none, then of such employee's parents; and, if none, then of the next of kin dependent upon such employee, for such injury or death resulting in whole or in part from the negligence of any of the officers, agents, or employees of such carrier, or by reason of any defect or insufficiency, due to its negligence, in its cars, engines, appliances, machinery, track, roadbed, works, boats, wharves, or other equipment.

"SEC. 3. That in all actions hereafter brought against any such common carrier by railroad to recover damages for personal injuries to an employee, or where such injuries have resulted in his death, the fact that the employee may have been guilty of contributory negligence shall not bar a recovery, but the damages shall be diminished by the jury in proportion to the amount of negligence attributable to such employee: Provided, That no such employee who may be injured or killed shall be held to have been guilty of contributory negligence in any case where the violation by such common carrier of any statute enacted for the safety of employees contributed to the injury or death of such employee.

"SEC. 4. That in any action brought against any common carrier under or by virtue of any of the provisions of this act to recover damages for injuries to, or the death of, any of its employees, such employee shall not be held to have assumed the risks of his employment in any case where the violation by such common carrier of any statute enacted for the safety of employees contributed to the injury or death of such employee.

"SEC. 5. That any contract, rule, regulation, or device whatsoever, the purpose or intent of which shall be to enable any common carrier to exempt itself from any liability created by this act, shall to that extent be void: Provided, That in any action brought against any such common carrier under or by virtue of any of the provisions of this act, such common carrier may set off therein any sum it has contributed or paid to any insurance, relief benefit, or indemnity that may have been paid to the injured employee or the person entitled thereto on account of the injury or death of which said action was brought.

"SEC. 6. That no action shall be maintained under this act unless commenced within two years from the day the cause of action accrued.

"SEC. 7. That the term 'common carrier' as used in this act shall include the receiver or receivers or other persons or corporations charged with the duty of the management and operation of the business of a common carrier.

"SEC. 8. That nothing in this act shall be held to limit the duty or liability of common carriers or to impair the rights of their employees under any other act or acts of Congress, or to affect the prosecution of any pending proceeding or right of action under the act of Congress entitled 'An act relating to liability of common carriers in the District of Columbia and Territories, and to common carriers engaged in commerce between the States and between the States and foreign nations to their employees,' approved June 11, 1906."

We believe this bill meets the objections of the Supreme Court to the act of June 11, 1906, known as the "employers' liability act," in the case of Howard, administratrix, etc., v. Illinois Central Railroad Company et al.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. Speaker, I yield half a minute to the gentleman from New York [Mr. ALEXANDER].

Mr. ALEXANDER of New York. Mr. Speaker, I simply rise to correct the statement of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. CLAYTON], my colleague on the committee. The membership of our committee is eighteen instead of seventeen, as he said, six Democrats and twelve Republicans. One Democrat was absent. The support of the Democrats present, therefore, was entirely unnecessary to report the bill favorably.

Mr. CLAYTON. But, Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman deducts the one who was absent, that would be eight out of sixteen.

Mr. ALEXANDER of New York. Eight out of seventeen you mean.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired. The Chair did not call to order the gentleman from New York, because the Chair had not called to order the gentleman from Alabama. It is clearly a violation of the rules to state what occurred in committee.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. Is it out of order when a report of a committee has been made, and when minority reports have been made and filed in the House, to refer to them in a speech upon the floor? Is that subject to the objection that one is disclosing the secrets of the committee?

The SPEAKER. Committee reports are official, but it is out of order to state what transpired in the committee, and that is all the Chair held.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The gentleman from Alabama clearly referred to the fact that three Republicans signed reports against this bill. [Cries of "Regular order!"] Mr. Speaker, I ask for order. I can not talk to the Speaker while other gentlemen are talking.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman rises to a parliamentary inquiry, and proceeds to make a speech——

Mr. WILLIAMS. I am not making a speech.

The SPEAKER. Touching a matter not before the House. He is, therefore, out of order.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Very well, then, I submit; but I never heard before that the minority reports constituted secrets of a committee.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PARKER].

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman from Alabama, who referred to my minority views, had read those views, which he said he had not, he would have found that those minority views expressed a desire that this bill in certain respects should be made far stronger. Men who are engaged in hazardous occupations like railroading and mining, in my opinion, should be afforded a definite compensation in case of accident from any cause resulting from that hazardous occupation. Their rights should not be confined, as they are by this bill, to accidents occurring by reason of the negligence of their fellow-servants. On the other hand, I think the bill, as stated by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. LITTLEFIELD], must constitutionally be confined to accidents resulting from the hazardous occupation, and that the employer shall not be distinguished from other employers as to any sort of accident that occurs. There are great questions connected with this whole matter, great questions which ought to have been decided in this House in a long and careful consideration of the bill, wherein we could determine what should be best done, and wherein we would not have been forced to our present action by dilatory tactics, which have forced us to consider this bill under suspension of the rules. I shall vote for the bill. [Applause on the Republican side.] I shall vote for the bill in the hope that it will be amended before it is finally passed, so as to be constitutional and so as to go further in certain matters where it ought to go further.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

The dissenting views of Mr. PARKER of New Jersey are as follows:

As I remarked last year on the consideration of the act for employers' liability, lately declared unconstitutional, I sympathize deeply with the movement for a proper extension to an employee of the right to recover a fair compensation for accidents that occur in a dangerous occupation, employing hosts of men, whose negligence may cause irremediable personal injuries to each other. Some modification of the common law should be and will be provided in the various States. While such modification involves important questions as to how far employers should be liable to their employees for the acts of their fellow-servants, the degree of contributory negligence on the part of the person injured that should bar recovery, and the extent to which the contract of employment should govern, the strong considerations in favor of some relaxation of the strict rules of the common law as to such an occupation have caused the passage and amendment of numerous State statutes, in which experience is teaching how the good of the community may be best obtained.

The United States have a full and exclusive jurisdiction in this matter in its Territories and possessions and in the District of Columbia, and for this exclusive jurisdiction we should, if possible, pass a law.

In morals each man is responsible for his own acts and negligence and not for those of another. It is by a fiction of the law adopted for the protection of the community that the employer is held responsible to outsiders hurt by the negligence of his servants. Within the employment itself, as indeed in life, each man assumes all ordinary hazards and answers for what he does or fails to do. He assumes the dangers of his occupation, and no other rule could prevail in small trades where only a few hands are employed. Each must take his own risk.

It is difficult and generally dangerous to modify the rules of the common law, but it is a matter of general consent that some such modification must be attempted in the great and hazardous enterprises of modern times employing dangerous machinery and thousands of men, and that those who work in these enterprises should receive some sort of insurance against accident analogous to the plan by which a pension is given in case of death or disability in the Army or Navy. In most countries this has been done by a compensation act, allowing rates of compensation that are based upon the wage-earning power of the man injured, his expectation of life, and other circumstances, and are adjusted sometimes by pension and sometimes by a single payment. In occupations which are dangerous not only to the workmen, but to others, such as the carriage of passengers, it is against the policy of the law that the negligence of the employee should be wholly excused and, as it were, encouraged, and that he should receive full compensation for damages to himself caused by his own negligence, and yet the risks of such occupations are so constant, varying, and tremendous, the strain of the work is so intense, and human nature is so fallible that it has been in many States found advisable to excuse negligence when it is slight, but not when it is so gross that it seems, as it were, willful, and to allow fixed or limited compensation in the nature of insurance. These compensation acts do not in their essence establish a liability, but are rather in the nature of a mutual insurance, which the profits of the business will have to stand and which must be made up either by an increase of receipts or a decrease of expenses in wages or other lines. Such allowances in the case of accident are made by way of part compensation. In some cases this result has been obtained by the voluntary action of the employer, as in the case of the Krupp Gun Works in Germany; it is more or less secured by means of accident insurance companies and voluntary beneficial associations; it has been attempted with more or less success in agreements between employer and employee, sometimes voluntary and sometimes compulsory, and, as above stated, it has become in many States and countries a matter of careful legislative provision. We must all sympathize with every endeavor in some measure to provide against the accidents of hazardous occupations if thereby we can avoid litigation and settle the amount which should be allowed in each particular case at such sum as will be a fair compensation without encouraging negligence or going beyond the ability of the business to stand.

I. To come to this specific bill, dealing with the hazardous occupation of railroading, it does not seem to me properly to meet the requirements above stated, even as to the territory entirely within United States jurisdiction.

1. It limits compensation to cases of injury by the negligence of coemployees, or defects of machinery, and does not provide for the ordinary hazards and accidents of a hazardous occupation, which are the real reason for making railroads an exception to the ordinary rule.

2. It does not limit recovery to accidents while actually engaged in this hazardous occupation, and the act is likely to be held unconstitutional because in many decisions the difference of hazard is held to be the only ground for any different rule as to master and servant.

3. It leaves the amount of compensation utterly undefined, to the encouragement of litigation and speculative claims.

4. It establishes a rule as to the division of damages in case of contributory negligence, which seems utterly unpractical.

5. It makes void all arrangements for settlement of such insurance as between employer and employee, and such systems, however much abused in the past, are susceptible of great good and should be regulated rather than abolished.

In my opinion section 2 should apply to all accidents, from whatever cause, occurring in the actual operation of the railroad to employees engaged in such operation. The cause of the accident should not be a matter of dispute, and the amount to be recovered by way of pension during temporary disability, or damages for permanent disability or death, should be limited so as to bear some relation to the wage of the employee.
